TAKE NOTICE

The Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, at its annual meeting in January, 1917, recommended the following grouping of the adolescent years for the purposes of grading and administration:

Group 1—years 13, 14 (12 optional).

Group 2—years 15, 16, 17.

Group 3—years 18-24.

NOTE 1—It is understood that these groupings shall in all cases be considered flexible, thus permitting the adjustment of group organization to local needs.

NOTE 2—The grouping of any particular pupil is not to be determined primarily by age. His week-day social relations, and his mental and religious development are exceedingly important factors.

NOTE 3—It should be clearly understood that in the application of these principles in the local school the relative efficiency of the organization of the Junior Department and Group 1 be taken into account in placing the twelve-year-old pupil.

NOTE 4—The upper age limit of Group 3 shall not be understood to prevent the promotion into the adult department of those young people, who, before passing twenty-four, shall have established homes of their own, or otherwise have taken up the responsibilities and interests of adult life.

This action of the Council modifies the statements on page 15.

Educational Secretary.

THE PUPIL

PHYSICAL ACTIVITY

I. WHAT IS YOUR AIM as a Sunday school teacher? What is the work that you are set to do?

You must do more than instruct. It is not enough to give your pupil a knowledge, however true and full, of the Bible or of Jewish history or of Christian doctrine. He might get to know all these things without doing anything worth while. You must reach his life and mold his action.

Yet you must do more than train your pupil in right habits of action. Animals can be trained. You want, more than the action, the will behind it. Your pupil is to become capable of acting for himself, in a voluntary, self-initiated expression of what he knows and believes.

As a teacher you aim, then, to develop a personality. You want your pupil not simply to know, but to live Christianity. You want him not merely to do right deeds, but to do them of his own will. There is but one real test of a teacher's work. It is not "What have you taught your pupil to know?" or "What have you trained him to do?" but "What sort of a person have you helped him to become?"

2. PERSONALITY GROWS NATURALLY. You cannot build it within a pupil by mechanically cementing ideas one upon the other, as though they were bricks. The youngest child in your class already has a personality of his own—living, growing, maturing. And like every other living thing, it has its laws of life and growth and development. Just as the body develops in accordance with the laws of its nature, so the mind develops from the blank of babyhood to the self-reliant personality of complete manhood in accordance with definite laws which by nature belong to it. If you are going to help a child become the right sort of a person, you must understand and use these laws, just as truly as the gardener must understand and use the natural laws of plant development.

3. THE TEACHER NEEDS, ABOVE ALL ELSE, TO UNDERSTAND CHILDREN. But that is not easy. Children are not “little men” and “little women.” They differ from adults, not simply in size and strength, but in the very quality of their powers.

In late years many trained observers have studied children, seeking to learn the fundamental characteristics of each stage in their development. The more important results of this systematic child-study are summed up for you in this book. You will need to supplement it, however, with your own study and experience. Observe children for yourself, especially in their spontaneous plays and games. Be mindful of the possibility that you may misinterpret their words and actions, and attribute to them thoughts and feelings which only an adult could have. One way to guard against this is to go to the “child you knew best of all.” Remember from your own childhood how a child thinks and feels. Get back to your own point of view, your interests and activities, your reasonings and attitudes, when you were the age of those you now teach. But, after all, if you are really to know and help children, you must share their life. “If we want to educate children,” said Martin Luther, “we must live with them ourselves.” Nothing can take the place of this direct personal relationship.

4. The most evident characteristic of childhood is its PHYSICAL ACTIVITY. Every impression that goes in at a child's senses, it seems, comes out at his muscles. This is one of nature's provisions for mental as well as physical development. Activity is essential to the growth of personality. This becomes clear when we think of ITS RESULTS:

(1) Physical growth. The first six years of a child's life is the time of most rapid growth. That this may be normal, the child needs proper physical conditions—good food, pure air, light and sunshine and plenty of sound sleep. And for the best realization of all these conditions and the assurance of healthy growth, there is constant need of physical activity and exercise.

(2) Physical development. Growth means simply increase in size; development means a change in the character of the bodily tissues, making for maturity and strength. There is only one way to insure development—through exercise. A child craves physical activity because nature wants its body to develop. Such exercise, moreover, develops the nervous system as well as the muscles. Strength and skill, steadiness and self-control, are some of its results.

(3) New sensations. The child is a discoverer in a strange new world. He does not wait for things to force themselves upon him; he pushes out to seek knowledge. Each bit of activity widens his experience. It brings new sensations, new information, better understanding, and lays open new possibilities.

(4) Use and meaning of things. The child is not ready to appreciate the structure of things, to discriminate forms and textures, or to comprehend definitions. He is interested primarily in what he can do with things. His activity determines their meaning to him. Ask any child to tell you what some familiar nouns stand for, and his answer will bear witness to this fact. "A knife is to cut," "Coffee is what papa drinks," "A circus is to see the elephant"—are typical children's definitions.

(5) Habits. A thing once done is easier to do again. What a child does becomes a very part of himself through the working of the law of habit. Grouping these last three results—new sensations, meanings and habits—we see that the child's mental and moral development is in a great degree dependent upon his physical activity.

5. THE CAUSES OF A CHILD'S PHYSICAL ACTIVITY are to be found in deep inner laws of his being. He is so made that he must be active.

(1) He is impelled to act by the energy that is being constantly generated within him. Much of his activity is the spontaneous expression of the bounding life that quickens every fiber of his being.

(2) He is impelled to act by the sensations he gets. He reaches for everything he sees, turns toward the sound he hears, plays with what he touches. His senses rouse his muscles. His impressions call forth reactions.

We can see why this should be so if we think for a moment of the structure of the nervous system. It is made up of three classes of cells—sensory, associative and motor. The sensory cells receive impressions; the motor cells impel the muscles to act. The associative cells connect the sensory with the motor, and so connect impressions and actions. These three classes of cells may be coupled up in a myriad intricate ways, yet they are always so related that the goal of a sensory current is an associative cell, and that of an associative current is ultimately motor. The natural result of every sensation, therefore, is an action. Every nerve current tends to go the whole way, and so to issue in activity. The nervous system has been well defined as a mechanism for translating sensations into movements. Its function is to receive impressions from the outside world, and to respond to them with appropriate actions.

(3) The child is impelled to act by his instincts. His nervous system contains certain pre-established pathways which incoming currents are sure to follow, as they go on to discharge themselves in action. These pathways are natural and hereditary. They constitute great inborn tendencies to act and feel in certain ways. Fear, shyness, curiosity, imitation, play, acquisitiveness—these are only a few of the natural tendencies which every child possesses, which determine the character of his reactions to the things that present themselves to him. Not all of these tendencies, of course, are present at birth; but they manifest themselves in the course of the natural growth and development of the nervous system. Each stage of development has its own dominant instincts, naturally and inevitably determining its actions and attitudes. A young child is just as certain to carry things to its mouth as is the little chick to peck at any small object within range. And at a certain age a child will fear the dark, a boy will love to fight, and a youth will conceive a tender passion, just as naturally and with as little consciousness of the reason why.

(4) The child is impelled to act by his ideas. For him, as a rule, to think is to act. He says whatever comes into his mind; he goes at once to seek the toy of which he happens to think. He reacts as directly to the presence of an idea or memory in his mind, as to his sensations. It matters nothing where the idea has come from. We express it by saying that a child is naturally impulsive; or, if the idea has come to him from someone else, that he is very suggestible.

We can see why this should be so if we think again of what we just learned about the nervous system. Ideas and memories are always accompanied by nerve-action within the associative cells which make up the gray matter of the brain. And a nerve current in the associative cells, we saw, tends naturally to run over into the motor cells, and so to result in action. Ideas, therefore, are dynamic; they become impulses.

6. These principles of action hold true for us who are grown as well as for little children. We, too, are impelled to action by every nerve current. Every sensation calls for a response; every idea is an impulse. WE DIFFER FROM LITTLE CHILDREN, HOWEVER, IN THE VOLUNTARY CONTROL which we have acquired, and which they do not yet possess. We are able to select from among our sensations those pertinent to our purposes, to prevent immediate reactions, and to check impulses by taking thought. Through experience we have gained self-control. The child, on the other hand, has had little experience, and consequently possesses few ideas and is able to grasp only in a very limited way the meaning of the situations he faces. We cannot expect him to have self-control. These great laws which in us are so complexly interwoven with the results of experience, appear in his life in their simplest and clearest form. His energy must find immediate physical expression. He reacts at once to his impressions, and is drawn here and there by the passing attraction of the moment. He thinks of but one thing at a time, and it comes right out in impulsive action. He is an eager bundle of instincts of which he is not yet master.

Yet, be it remembered, it is out of this very turmoil of activity, all lacking in unity as it is, and out of it alone, that growth and development, experience and intelligence, habit and will, can come. And so it is plain what our attitude toward it should be. We will seek to use and direct, rather than repress, the physical activity of childhood.

TO THE LEADER OF THE TRAINING-CLASS:

The first lesson is introductory. It gives the point of view of the course, and presents in a preliminary way certain fundamental principles of psychology. Do not assign it for study; but read it with your class in the first hour that you meet them, having each member take his turn at reading a paragraph. There are two advantages in this plan: (1) You will thus profitably use the time of that first meeting, which is so often practically wasted. (2) With the reading you can show your pupils how to study. Most of them do not know how; and none know just how you want to go to work upon this book.

You will make such explanations and add such concrete illustrations, of course, as you may deem wise. Do not try to deal fully with the principles here introduced, however; and do not assign this lesson for further study. These are principles that will come up constantly; and they are more fully dealt with in Lessons 7 and 8. Assign Lesson 2 for your next meeting.

The text of this book is an abridgment of Part I of the author's "The Pupil and the Teacher." The abridgment has made it necessary to omit most of the concrete illustrative material to be found in the larger work. Such material you must supply; and you should urge your pupils to look for it. Do not rest content with the mere recitation of principles; insist that their understanding of them be shown by their ability to find concrete cases that illustrate these principles.

The larger work contains a list of review questions for each lesson, and you are referred to it for such questions should you wish to use them. This book contains instead suggestions for observation, meant to guide your pupils in their concrete study of boys and girls and to help them search for examples. They should be trained to describe these examples fully and to discuss carefully the principles involved in each. This should be done frequently in writing.

There is a brief bibliography for each lesson, of such books only as should generally be found in public libraries. The class itself should be provided with a small reference library. Books marked with an * are recommended for this as a minimum list. A few books of fiction are included in some of the lists. Pupils who find the work of concrete observation difficult may be interested in these; and all will find them helpful in illustration of the principles studied.

A list of topics is also given, which may serve as starting-points for investigation, written report or discussion. These are suggestive only, and may be dealt with in whatever way seems best suited to the abilities and needs of the class. Many classes will doubtless omit them entirely; some may wish to expand them.

You should, of course, plan your own method of conducting your class. There is no one way. Each class must be handled for itself. The following suggestions, however, may be helpful:

(1) Insist that your pupils study and master each week's assignment—not by memory, but by understanding.

(2) Take time at the close of each period to make assignment of the work for the coming week. Tell your pupils what to do; show them how to go to work upon it, and make each responsible for some specific bit of work beyond the text—to find an example of the working of some principle, to do this or that piece of observation, to investigate and report upon some topic.

(3) When the class meets again cover the material in a vital and interesting discussion fashion, that will at once test your pupils' mastery of the assignment and give each an opportunity to contribute the results of his specific task. Be sure to have something of your own to contribute. Do not let the hour degenerate into (a) a memory drill, (b) a lecture, or (c) a mere hearing of reports, oral or written.

(4) Ask your pupils to hand in written reports upon their specific tasks, whether of observation or investigation. They will thus study harder and observe more closely; they will discern what they really know as distinguished from what they have vaguely in mind; and you will check up their work and save precious time when the class meets. It goes without saying that you should read and mark these papers carefully, and should let each pupil know how well or badly he is doing.

(5) In your own preparation and planning keep well ahead of your class. You should read this book through before beginning work with them, and plan in a general way how you will handle it. Do not be afraid to omit some of its material, should that seem best. It supplies more than most classes will use fully, with the purpose of giving the teacher a chance to select and adapt.

LESSON II

EARLY CHILDHOOD

I. Everyone recognizes that there are certain PERIODS OF DEVELOPMENT through which we pass in the growth from babyhood to maturity, and that each period has its distinctive characteristics. But there is room for difference of opinion concerning the number of periods which ought to be distinguished, and the ages at which boundary lines may be drawn.

As a matter of fact, there are no hard and fast periods, and no exact boundary lines. Growth is gradual and continuous. Individual children, moreover, differ greatly. Some enter a given stage earlier, and pass through it more quickly, than others.

The most definite transition is that from childhood to adolescence. It comes usually from twelve to fourteen, and is marked by deep-seated physical and mental changes.

The Sunday school has recognized a subdivision of the years before this transition into three periods, and three periods in the years after. The six periods, and the corresponding departments of the Sunday school, are:

(1) Early Childhood, under six: Cradle Roll, birth to 4; Beginners, 4, 5.

(2) Middle Childhood, three years, ages 6, 7, 8: Primary.

(3) Later Childhood, four years, ages 9, 10, 11, 12: Junior.

(4) Early Adolescence, four years, ages 13, 14, 15, 16: Intermediate.

(5) Later adolescence, from 17 to maturity: Senior.

(6) Manhood and Womanhood: Adult.

This division we shall follow in this book because we are concerned with the Sunday school as at present organized. It should be said, however, that a more natural division would put the transition years, twelve to fourteen, into a separate period. Public school authorities are fast adopting a scheme of organization which assigns six instead of eight grades to the elementary school, and groups the former seventh and eighth grades with the former first year of the high school into a junior high school. The Sunday school could with advantage make a like change. The scheme of periods and departments would then run as follows:

- (1) Early Childhood, under six: Cradle Roll, Beginners.
- (2) Middle Childhood, three years, ages six to eight: Primary.
- (3) Later Childhood, three years, ages nine to eleven: Junior.
- (4) Early Adolescence, three years, ages twelve to fourteen: Intermediate.
- (5) Middle Adolescence, three years, ages fifteen to seventeen: Senior.
- (6) Later Adolescence, seven years, ages eighteen to twenty-four: Young People's.
- (7) Manhood and Womanhood: Adult.

2. We begin the study of these periods with early childhood—the first six years of life.

THE CHILD LIVES IN A WORLD OF PLAY. Play is a preparation for life. Groos has shown that young animals instinctively anticipate in their play the activities which will be of use in their maturity. So, too, the play of children develops instincts and powers which will later be needed. Girls play with dolls and tea-sets; boys like to make things, build houses and dams, keep store or play at soldier. Colonel Parker used to say that "play is God's method of teaching children how to work."

A. B. P. S.

More than this, play is essential to the best general development of body, mind and character. Coe sums it up well:

“Quickness and accuracy of perception; co-ordination of the muscles, which puts the body at the prompt service of the mind; rapidity of thought; accuracy of judgment; promptness of decision; self-control; respect for others; the habit of co-operation; self-sacrifice for the good of a group—all these products of true education are called out in plays and games.”

3. THE PLAY OF EARLY CHILDHOOD has its distinctive characteristics:

(1) It is play, not amusement. The child is never content simply to watch the activities of others, and to be amused by things done for him. He wants to enter into the action himself.

(2) The little child cares nothing for games—that is, for play subject to rules. His plays are almost wholly free and unregulated, and any attempt to dictate when or where or how he shall play is apt to meet with failure.

(3) Children of this age play alone. If they do play with one another their enjoyment is self-centered. There is neither rivalry nor team-play.

(4) The child's play is at first wholly a matter of the senses and muscles. He uses neither in any accurate or definite way, but finds keen enjoyment in the free repetition of some activity or sensation. A natural rhythmical tendency is soon manifest. Jingles and songs and rhythmic movements are a source of keen delight, while many a story or bit of poetry that is not at all understood will yet be enjoyed for the cadence of the voice that reads or tells it.

(5) Plays exercising the memory and imagination begin about the third year. From that time on to the end of the period the child's play becomes largely imaginative and dramatic.

(6) Throughout the period the child's play is imitative.

4. EAGER AND IMPRESSIONABLE SENSES are characteristic of early childhood. The mind of a child is intensely concrete. He lives in a world of perceptions, rather than of thought. Round-eyed, quick to hear and eager to touch, he is busy absorbing the world about him.

And he is not content simply to await sensations; he actively seeks new experiences. CURIOSITY is one of the earliest, as it is one of the most permanent, of the human instincts. It manifests itself first as sensory curiosity—the tendency to prolong sensations, to experience them again, and to seek new ones. Later, rational curiosity appears—the desire to learn the relations which things have to one another, and the tendency to draw and test conclusions respecting matters not directly experienced. The curiosity of early childhood is predominantly sensory, though rational curiosity begins to reveal itself in the latter half of the period, as anyone well knows who has had to answer a child's "How?" "Why?" "What for?" and "Where from?"

The child's senses will drink in anything that is presented to them. He is unable to discriminate between good and bad, true and false, wise and foolish. There is only one safe rule: Do absolutely nothing before a child that you would not have him copy. Let nothing touch his senses that you would not have enter permanently into his life. There may be exceptions: undoubtedly some things which a child sees and hears make no permanent impressions upon him—but you cannot tell when the exceptions come.

You cannot tell by questioning a little child what things have made a lasting impression upon him—for many reasons besides the likelihood that he will not catch the drift of your questions. We all know that many things which we see and hear modify our thoughts and actions in ways of which we remain unconscious; and this is far more true of the child. Moreover, the memory of a child is different from our own. It is exceedingly impressionable and retentive, yet with little power to recall.

5. A LITTLE CHILD IS INTENSELY IMAGINATIVE. He thinks in concrete pictures. He has not yet learned the distinction between the material and the spiritual, or even how to bound off fact from fancy.

(1) He tends to personify everything. As the first and most definite objects of his knowledge are persons, and the terms he understands best are those which stand for actions, he interprets everything in personal terms. So tales of miracles and impossible wonders, of fairies, elves and angels, are as probable as matters of sober fact; and he delights in them because they appeal to his love of action and to his sense of wonder.

(2) He lives in a world of make-believe. His play, we have seen, is dramatic. Father's walking-stick becomes a horse, himself a soldier captain, and sticks of wood the enemy. He turns himself into a railroad engine, and goes even about his errands puffing and flailing his arms like driving-rods, backing and switching, and coming to a stop with the hiss of escaping steam. For hours or even for days he becomes another person or an animal. Lonely children often play with imaginary companions; and cases are to be found where such creatures of fancy abide and play a very real part in the child's life for months or even years. "Let's play we're sisters," said two little sisters who had been quarreling, and the imagined relationship brought the peace which the real one had failed to maintain.

(3) He makes no clear distinction between imagination and reality. Personifying natural events as he does, he may fail to distinguish between the real happening and his interpretation of it. Beneath his make-believe there often runs an under-consciousness of its unreal character; but like as not he forgets, and grows really afraid of the make-believe lion, or cries over some imagined trouble. It is this confusion of fact and interpretation, of reality and play, that is responsible for many so-called "lies" of children. They call, not for punishment, but for comprehending sympathy and patient training.

(4) He is intensely eager for stories. They must be full of action and of pictures, simple and without intricacy of plot. They must lie close enough to the child's own experience to rouse definite mental pictures, yet have enough of mystery and novelty to stir his feelings. They must have a climax, and must lead straight to it and then stop. They must contain some rhythm or repetition in which he can delight. Above all, they must be told by one who himself retains the spirit of childhood, and who sees and feels the things he tells. Such stories the child will call for again and again, and often he wants them repeated in the very words that were used before.

6. A LITTLE CHILD IS CREDULOUS AND SUGGESTIBLE. He believes anything you tell him, simply because of his lack of experience. He has no fund of established ideas as the rest of us do, to serve as a basis for distinguishing truth from falsehood. The suggestion remains uncontradicted, and issues in action from the very motive power that all ideas possess.

7. THE LITTLE CHILD IS EXCEEDINGLY IMITATIVE. Imitation may be looked upon as a form of suggestion. We are more likely to be influenced by what others do than by what they say.

Reflex or unconscious imitation is present almost from the beginning. Dramatic imitation appears about the third year. Voluntary imitation begins a little before—when the child purposely seeks to act like another does. His repetition of words, as we teach him to talk and he tries the difficult pronunciations again and again to secure our approval, is an example. He imitates single actions rather than persons; he wants to do something like uncle, rather than to be like him.

8. A CHILD OF THIS AGE IS NATURALLY SELF-CENTERED. He knows no motives other than those of his own pleasure and pain. His little acts of generosity are done only for the approval or pleasure they bring. If he plays with other children, or if he likes to be with others, they are ministers to his own enjoyment. He is the center of his world, and everything and everybody in it exists for him. The word "my" is the great one in his vocabulary. Yet this is not selfishness; it is simply nature.

It is tempered by the fact that he is very affectionate, and is keenly sensitive to the personal attitudes of others. He finds the greatest of pleasure in a smile and caress, and is heart-broken at a frown. There is truth in the old adage that one may trust a man whom children and animals like. The child, at least, instinctively fathoms the dispositions. Nature has put him close to the heart of men.

FOR OBSERVATION

Under this heading there will be suggested in each lesson aspects of childhood and youth which you should observe and describe, thus securing concrete examples of the working of the principles which you are studying. In case you cannot observe them in any children with whom you may get into contact, try to remember from your own childhood. A third way to secure such examples is to go to stories and biographies. Whatever the source, you should try to describe your example carefully and to make clear the principles involved, doing this as often as you can in writing.

1. Forms of play anticipatory of later life.
2. Development through play.
3. Powers of mind and body used in play.

5. A little child's impressionability.
6. Curiosity.
7. A child's imaginativeness.
8. Imaginary companions.
9. Failure to distinguish fact from fancy.
10. A child's suggestibility.
11. A child's imitativeness.
12. Children's spontaneous prayers.
13. The religious ideas of children.

LESSON III

MIDDLE CHILDHOOD

There is no evident transition from early to middle childhood. Most of the characteristics of the former period belong to this. Yet the child of six or more differs from the one who has not reached that birthday. He has had a wider experience, of course, which gives a richer meaning to every perception and a more definite control for every impulse. But the great difference lies in the fact that he has entered school. That gives him a wholly new viewpoint. His world has changed. He enters into a wider circle of companionship and a more definite round of responsibilities than home or kindergarten had made possible.

1. PHYSICAL ACTIVITY AND PLAY characterize this period of childhood as well as the first. But there are manifest differences:

(1) Activity is more purposive and controlled. Whereas the younger child found delight in the mere activity itself, the child of this period begins to find pleasure in what he can accomplish. Yet he has not developed enough control to be able to hold very long to a tedious task, or to see through complications and conquer many difficulties.

(2) Play takes the form of games, at first with very simple rules, and then more complex.

(3) The child no longer plays alone, but with companions, and rivalry and competition begin.

(4) Imaginative play, with its little dramas of make-believe, reaches its culmination in the first half of this period.

2. THE CHILD'S SENSES ARE AS EAGER AS EVER, and to them we must appeal in our teaching. But now he is better able both to use his senses and to understand the messages they bring.

It has been well said that we are able to see as much in anything as we can put into it. It is not the mere seeing or hearing, but the meaning which sights and sounds convey, that is important. And their meaning depends upon what is within one—upon his point of view and his ability to understand.

We always interpret the new in terms of the old. We grasp the unknown only by relating it to the known; to name it even we must class it with some past experience. A little girl of three called to her mother in wonder to come and see how the flowers had melted in the heat of the sun. A bright boy of the same age called a ring-shaped anthill a doughnut, and put a young uncle to confusion by asking whether his budding mustache was an eye-brow. These and like sayings of children are simple illustrations of one of the most fundamental of all laws of the mind—that new ideas grow always out of the old, and that what we already know biases our interest in novel situations and our comprehension of their meaning.

The term APPERCEPTION is applied to this process of getting meanings. It is the process of interpreting, comprehending, digesting and assimilating whatever presents itself to the mind. THE LAW OF APPERCEPTION is that the meaning of each new experience is determined by the relations it bears to one's ideas, instincts and habits. In early childhood, we have seen, things are apperceived from the standpoint of use and action. The child's instincts in the main determine his attitudes toward what is presented to him, and hence its meaning. But as experience grows, and ideas and habits multiply, they come to serve more and more as the basis for his apperceptions.

To understand, therefore, what your pupil's experience has been, what ideas and habits he has acquired, and so what point of view he will bring to your teaching, is your primary duty. He will interpret everything you say and do from the plane of his own experience. If you can talk with him upon that same plane, and express your ideas in terms that belong to it, you can be reasonably sure that he will get just the meaning you want him to get. If you cannot, he will get some meaning or other, but not what you intend.

It is especially difficult to share the point of view of children from six to eight, and to make sure that we understand their apperceptions. Middle childhood is a transition time—from home to school, from play to work, from instinct to will, from imagination to reason. Each child is working out his own ideas from the host of new experiences that are coming to him, and he is bound to get some that are strange enough from our viewpoint. There is one definite and practical way, however, to get into touch with the child's apperceptions, which you should by no means neglect. Visit his grade in the public schools; find out what he is learning there, and bring your teaching into as close correlation with it as you can.

3. THE IMAGINATION OF MIDDLE CHILDHOOD is no less active, but more coherent and better controlled than that of early childhood.

(1) The child is as eager as ever for stories. They must have more of detail and of connected action than those which appealed to him when younger. They must be dramatic, with plenty of life and movement, yet with a unity and coherence that bring them nearer to the plane of reality.

(2) The child now makes a distinction between fact and fancy. His imagination is becoming critical. All stories were alike to the credulity of early childhood. But now he is getting perspective. He recognizes a difference between stories that are "just stories" and those that are "really true" or "could happen." Some that he once implicitly believed are now called into question. He wants to know whether fairy tales are true, or whether Santa Claus is real.

4. The fact is that REASON IS AWAKENING. The child is beginning to grasp the relations of things, and to fit them together into a connected whole. With the influx of new ideas at school and the freedom of a wider companionship, he soon outgrows the myths of his earlier years and reaches out toward a more rational comprehension of the world about him. It is a time of eager mental activity and of endless questions. The child is putting his world together.

We are apt to make either of two mistakes in dealing with the child at this time. One is to demand too much of him, assuming a reasoning power which he has not yet attained. He reasons only in terms of sequence. He associates cause and effect, not because he sees the real ground of their relationship, but simply because they happen together in time and space. He cannot analyze such a relationship into its elements and discriminate the essential from the non-essential. He cannot reason abstractly, and is not at all certain to draw a logical conclusion from given premises.

The other mistake is to fail to meet the demands which the child's reason makes upon us. The most important of these demands are for (1) consistency, (2) openness and sincerity.

(1) Consistency is demanded because the child is forming his own ideas of right and wrong. He forms them in the same way that he does his ideas of physical things—by reasoning from the sequence of events. Actions are bad, to his mind, which are followed by disagreeable results; those are good which bring pleasure. Moral laws are to him simple statements of cause and effect. He judges actions solely by their consequences. It is plain what is required of us. We must be firm and consistent in our dealings with him. We must abide by the simple laws we wish him to learn. There must be no exceptions, justified by some higher bit of reasoning that he cannot comprehend. We must see to it that always bad results follow bad actions, and good goes with good. In short, we must confront him with a moral order as inflexible as is the physical order, that he may be able to formulate definite moral laws, and that obedience to law and respect for the right may grow naturally within him.

(2) Openness and sincerity are demanded in our answers to his questions. The mother who will not answer truthfully a child's doubt concerning Santa Claus because "it is so nice for the little ones to believe in him," sells her boy's birthright for a paltry bit of play. The teacher is faithless to his trust who teaches a child to accept as literal truth a story or figure that he does not himself accept in that way, because "children are not old enough to be bothered with such things."

We need to remember that the child now has both imagination and reason, and that he will continue throughout life to need both. We must recognize the distinction that he draws between "just stories" and "things that really happened." We must minister both to the story-appetite and to the hunger for facts. And—most important of all—we must show him that there is a vast middle ground between mere fancy on the one hand and the plain recital of fact on the other: the middle ground of truth presented under the forms of the imagination. Give both the truth and the story of Santa, then, the myths of the Greeks and Norsemen as well as primary lessons in science, the fact with the figure in the Bible story. Do not be afraid to answer when a child asks whether a story ever happened: "No, it never happened; but don't you think it tells us something true?"—and show him just what you mean.

The child is not ready, of course, to receive the whole truth on every subject—in fact, not on any. But that is not necessary. To hold something back is not to evade or to deceive. We need give only so much as his spontaneous interests demand, and that must be in a form that he can understand.

Children's questions about birth and sex constitute a special problem, and one peculiarly grave. The parent who evades them condemns his boy to find out from companions in ways that are full of impure suggestion. Frankly and plainly, without preaching and without mystery, these questions should be answered with the simple and literal truth—never going beyond the child's spontaneous interest, but satisfying it completely. They are not for the teacher to answer, however. It is the duty of the father and mother.

5. THE CHILD OF THIS AGE IS STILL SELF-CENTERED and must be dealt with individually. He likes to be with other children, but the competitive motive is strong and he has no idea of subordinating self to the good of the group.

THE INSTINCT OF IMITATION, however, leads the child out in a measure beyond himself. He now imitates the doer rather than the deed. Instead of copying single actions, he wants to be like the person behind the action. He begins to think of what he would like to be when grown-up, and his choice is always the reflection of what those nearest to him are—father, mother, friend or teacher. Your influence is never greater than now.

LESSON IV

LATER CHILDHOOD

Life is unique in the years from nine to thirteen. Later childhood has as distinctive characteristics as adolescence. Yet it is hard to say where the period begins. The average child enters it when he begins to read easily and naturally; and it will be best for our purpose to let this mark the transition.

1. THIS IS A PERIOD OF SLOW GROWTH, OF HEALTH AND HARDIHOOD. The first marked difference between the sexes appears, girls being quicker to develop than boys. The tenth year in girls and the eleventh in boys are years of very slow growth. In both sexes this retardation is followed by an acceleration which heralds the coming of adolescence. Since this acceleration begins a year or more earlier in girls, they are apt to be taller and heavier than boys at the close of this period and the beginning of the next. In both sexes it is a time of good health and boundless energy.

2. INDEPENDENCE AND SELF-ASSERTION are, to fond mothers especially, the most obvious characteristics of the period. And now certainly, if at no other time, the boy's interests reflect the activities of a more primitive generation. Fighting, hunting, fishing, exploring, collecting, go to make up his life. He is more likely to play truant or to run away than at any other period. He is full of daring and adventure, of dash and go.

3. But there is another side. Later childhood marks a distinct advance in moral development. The SOCIAL INSTINCTS begin to ripen in this period, and obedience to law becomes a matter of social well-being resting upon the child's own initiative, rather than of mere habit or imitation or authority.

(1) The sexes now draw apart. Boys and girls no longer share the same interests or enjoy the same games. In the latter half of this period, and in the first few years of adolescence, girls are more mature than boys of the same age. They develop more quickly, not only in body but in mind.

(2) Social motives predominate in the games of the period, which are almost wholly competitive. Some are games in which individual competes with individual, each striving for his own success and glory. But more and more the boy becomes interested in games that call for team-play rather than for individual prowess.

(3) Team games call for organization; yet even aside from them, the "gang instinct," as it has been called, is at work in the later years of the period. Boys and girls of this age naturally and spontaneously organize themselves into informal groups and into more or less formal clubs.

Dr. Sheldon's study of such spontaneously organized clubs shows that of over a thousand boys who answered his inquiries, 851 belonged to organizations of this sort. 862 societies were reported, and 623 fully described. Of these, $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent were philanthropic, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent secret, $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent social, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent literary, $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent industrial, 17 per cent predatory (for exploring, building, hunting, fighting, preying), and 61 per cent athletic. The ages at which these clubs were formed are as follows: At eight, 28; at nine, 44; at ten, 118; at eleven, 155; at twelve, 164; at thirteen, 188; at fourteen, 90; at fifteen, 80; at sixteen, 34; at seventeen, 11. We note that the ages at which the most societies were formed are eleven, twelve and thirteen. The interests, moreover, change with age. Predatory societies are at their height at eleven, and then gradually disappear. Athletic societies multiply rapidly until thirteen, then diminish in number.

A. B. P. S.

Girls and boys naturally organize in separation from one another. Girls formed five times as many social societies as boys, twice as many philanthropic, and three times as many secret, industrial and literary. Boys formed four times as many predatory and seven times as many athletic societies as the girls. The girls were more nearly governed by adult motives than boys.

(4) With this awakening of the social instincts, and their expression in spontaneous organizations, there comes into the child's life a new moral force—that of the opinion of his peers. He has entered into a social order of his own, and its laws become his standards of right and wrong. He no longer imitates parents and teachers, but his own companions, or the one whom the gang holds a hero. He cares little for the opinion of older people, but a great deal for what the "bunch" thinks.

(5) A strong sense of honor is characteristic. A boy's fundamental virtue is loyalty. He will stick by the rest of the fellows through thick and thin. And from this loyalty springs a fine sense of what is honorable and true and just. His boyish conceptions of these things are often enough distorted; but they are virtues none the less, and virtues really his own.

All this applies particularly, of course, to boys. You cannot, even in speaking of them, mix the sexes at this age. Yet it is as true of girls, with the difference of perspective that is cast by the different social life into which they now begin to enter. Every mother knows well that a daughter now begins to have "ideas of her own," which it is idle to seek to repress or to expel by force. The wise mother is she who respects the daughter's personality, invites her confidence and seeks to share her point of view, and so by companionship rather than by domination leads her into clear-sighted, self-reliant womanhood.

A. B. P. S.

4. This is the period of LIFE'S FIRST IDEALISM. Boys and girls now begin to form ideals for themselves.

These first ideals are concrete. They are found always in some person. Later childhood has well been called THE AGE OF HERO-WORSHIP. Middle childhood imitates persons, but not as ideals; adolescence conceives ideals, but not in personal terms. Now, ideal and person are inseparable. You cannot help a boy or girl of this age by talking of ideals in general and in the abstract. You must set before them a hero.

But that is not easy. Heroes are not made to order, or worshiped according to precept. Boys especially seem apt enough to idealize wrong characters and perversely fail to be attracted by the heroes we would press upon them. Life is reaching beyond home and school. Its heroes come from the new worlds just opening to the vision of boyhood and girlhood. They must be in some degree removed from the ordinary round of humdrum and familiar things. They must have something of that mystery which always surrounds an object of worship. Boys are more apt to get their heroes from the world about them, girls from their reading, from history or fiction. Boys always idealize men, while girls may choose either men or women.

It is achievement that makes a hero. Men who can do things well, men who can get results, men who can in anything, are the boy's heroes just as they are ours. Because his instincts and interests are primitive, he is most ready to idealize physical strength or skill or daring. But it is only because he is not yet able to realize achievements of a different sort. As fast as he becomes able to comprehend the work of Lincoln, of Darwin, of Luther, he is ready to pay tribute to strength of intellect and heart and will.

This principle tells us, too, how to present Jesus to our pupils. It must be as a hero, in the sheer strength of His manhood and His achievements. Talk of what He did, not of what He was. In this age, children will not love Him for His goodness, but they will learn to love goodness because they honor Him and His deeds. Do not talk much, however, about His being a hero; and certainly do not ask your pupils to call Him one. There are some things in life that cannot stand much talking about—heroism and loyalty are among them. Simply present His life and its deeds so vividly and concretely that the strength and power of His personality cannot help but shine through.

5. At no time of life is there a greater HUNGER FOR BOOKS AND READING than now. Most of us can remember how eagerly we awaited the weekly arrival of The Youth's Companion, or how we pored over Oliver Optic. What woman can forget her girlhood's delight in Louisa Alcott's books?

The teacher could ask for no better opportunity than is afforded by this insatiable demand of later childhood for something to read. We make a mistake if we treat the child's reading either as a mere amusement or as a sugar-coat for a moral. To the end of life the love of good literature remains one of its mightiest spiritual forces. The child must learn to love the best. It is your privilege to put your pupil in touch with the literary heritage of the race. Pick things that he can comprehend, but do not be afraid of the best. "Periods which no master has described, whose spirit no poet breathes," says Herbart, "are of little value to education." Books of real insight into life and of genuine literary value, books of truth caught by the imagination and felt within, will grip the minds and hearts of children as they do our own.

6. HABITS are more easily formed in this period than at any other time of life, and are more lasting. A multitude of brain cells are just maturing. Impressions are easy, and connections between cells quickly established. Every boy knows that if he is ever to become a great baseball player he must begin now. Later he will not be plastic enough to get the finer knack of the man who "handles himself as if he were born to it."

It follows that MEMORY is best in these years, for memory, as we shall see, is closely related to habit. It is the time for drill work in school. Repetition will now fix anything in the mind, whether it be understood or not, and many a glib answer will deceive us into thinking that the pupil has really grasped our teaching. This is the time to learn such Bible passages, hymns and the like, as the pupil should keep laid up, word for word, in the mind—a precious spiritual resource till the end of life.

7. AN AWAKENING OF INTEREST IN RELIGION is apt to be manifest at the end of this period or the beginning of early adolescence. The child is approaching life's decision time. We must keep this in mind throughout these years.

2. Primitive interests and activities of these years.
3. The drawing apart of the sexes.
4. The development of team-play.

You should note that for this period and those following your own memories are available to a degree that they were not for early and middle childhood. If you can add to your objective observation of some bit of boyish behavior your own memory of what you thought and how you felt when you behaved that same way, you will understand both the inside and the outside of that aspect of life.

LESSON V

EARLY ADOLESCENCE

The passage from childhood to adolescence is life's greatest and most definite natural transition. Rooted in the development of new physical powers, it transforms the mental and spiritual life as well. It has been well called a new birth. It is the awakening of manhood and womanhood.

1. THE TERM ADOLESCENCE is applied to the whole period from this first awakening of new powers to their final ripening into young manhood and womanhood. Its boundaries cannot be exactly fixed. The age of puberty varies with different individuals, and is earlier for girls than for boys. It comes generally at thirteenth or fourteen for boys, and twelve or thirteen for girls. The end of adolescence and the beginning of manhood and womanhood depends a great deal upon circumstances. The boy who must leave school early to go to work, the girl who must assume the responsibilities of a household, mature quickly. The complexity of modern life, on the other hand, and the elaborate education it demands, have lengthened adolescence. The end of the period comes more often at twenty-four or twenty-five than at twenty-one, which is the age recognized by law.

The period may be divided at the seventeenth birthday. Early adolescence thus covers four years, ages thirteen to sixteen; and later adolescence, the years from seventeen to maturity.

2. PHYSICALLY, early adolescence is a time of very rapid growth, both in height and weight. During the three years from the twelfth birthday to the fifteenth, boys increase in weight 40 per cent and in height 14 per cent, while girls increase in weight 36 per cent and in height 10 per cent. Girls are taller than boys from the twelfth to the fifteenth years, and heavier from the thirteenth to the fifteenth. After fifteen boys exceed both in height and weight. The most profound changes of these years, of course, are those connected with the development of the powers of sex.

3. EARLY ADOLESCENCE IS A TIME OF EXPANSION. Life widens in a hundred unexpected ways, and may take any one of them as its final direction. It is full of conflicting impulses, of contradictions and surprises. Through all, however, three fundamental characteristics stand out definitely: the expansion of selfhood, a new recognition of social values, and an emotional instability associated with the development of the sexual instincts.

4. THE EXPANSION OF SELFHOOD. It is now that the boy really begins to attain selfhood. He is filled with a new sense of power and with a desire to use it as a man should.

The period begins with the independence and self-assertion characteristic of the gang instinct—primitive in its interests and blind to the greater world beyond. It ends with an independence and self-assertion of a quite different sort—the independence of vision, the self-assertion of one who has caught a glimpse of the great interests of humanity, and who feels his right to give and get, on his own account, as a sharer of the big world's life.

This expansion of selfhood reveals itself in the desire to go to work which every boy feels at this age. It is hard now to keep boys at school. They feel that they ought to be getting at a trade or beginning their business career, and that it is time they were making money.

Early adolescence is genuinely and passionately idealistic. The boy is no longer a mere imitator; he is more than a hero-worshiper. He begins to discern inward qualities, and to feel the intrinsic worth of truth, faith, self-sacrifice. And it is not simply that he admires these virtues in others; he feels them to be a forthputting of his own deeper self. They are directions in which his life would expand, forms in which his self would find expression.

5. THE SOCIAL INSTINCTS now mature rapidly, and there is a definite recognition of social values. The social forms of later childhood persist in the first year or two of this period, but are gradually outgrown. The gang instinct is strongest at thirteen or fourteen and then declines. It is not that the youth becomes less social; rather that he is becoming conscious of a larger world. The opinion of his fellows remains a powerful moral force, as it does to the end of life; yet now he begins to recognize the wider bearings of his actions, and to look for judgment beyond his immediate companions.

At middle adolescence life becomes genuinely altruistic. The youth is glad, in pursuit of his ideals and for sake of others, to endure hardships and to make sacrifices. He wants to be more than square; he feels the worth of unselfishness. It follows that here, too, selfishness begins. The child who is a mere bundle of instincts, the boy who has not yet felt an altruistic impulse, may be self-centered, but not selfish. But the youth who feels the call to a bit of sacrifice, and rejects it, lets an unworthy thing enter his life. Genuine selfishness exists only when the higher impulse is present, but is denied.

6. THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE SEXUAL INSTINCTS underlies every other change at adolescence. It strengthens youth's aspirations and colors its social attitudes.

New impulses, new sensations and emotions, new temptations, new problems, new meanings, a new conscience and a new heart—from without and within, the whole world and himself seem alike strange and wonderful to the adolescent who first feels the race-old forces by which life begets life. It is a time of unstable equilibrium, of strong yet shifting emotions, of purposes not understood.

In the first years of the period the sex-repulsion continues which was characteristic of later childhood; but the sexes begin to be attracted in its latter half. Boys begin to pay attention to their dress, and girls are no longer tomboys. Few pass the age of sixteen without some little love affair.

From sixteen to eighteen the feelings deepen and acquire more stability. It is the time at which emotional religious conversions are most apt to occur.

7. INTELLECTUALLY adolescence is marked by the development of the higher powers. The youth is able to reason, not simply in terms of time sequence, but of cause and effect, and logical ground and consequence. And he becomes a pretty rigorous logician. He wants to understand. He seeks life's rational basis.

It follows that the adolescent is critical. He rejects mere authority. The springs of moral judgment are now within him; he will accept no bald imperatives. He is no longer credulous; he demands proofs. He is not content with scattered bits of knowledge; he wants to see things in their relations.

It is easy to see, therefore, why doubt should often be thought to be characteristic of early adolescence. The sort of doubt that denies, however, is not natural at this period. It comes afterward, in later adolescence. Now there is simply the demand for reasons. If it turns to a more negative attitude, it is generally because we have not met that demand the right way. Clear, logical statement of beliefs and reasons will be accepted. But we can force the youth to doubt if we press authority where he seeks reason, or if, in matter or method, our teaching is below his level.

8. EARLY ADOLESCENCE IS A TIME OF MORE OR LESS TURMOIL AND CONFUSION. There is not disorganization, so much as lack of organization. The youth does not understand himself; he cannot at once co-ordinate the many new impulses that are welling up within him.

Physically the boy or girl in the early 'teens is overgrown and awkward. The parts of the body do not grow at the same rate, and there is clumsiness and incoördination of movement. The boy's voice breaks. The girl feels big and restless and is afraid to talk. Both are very sensitive, and are too often made more so by the talk of parents and family, who speak of the awkward age, comment on their personal appearance, or tease them about their budding consciousness of the other sex.

The extremes and contradictions of adolescence have often been noted. The boy is now one thing, and now its opposite. He suddenly awakes to a new interest, and throws himself into it with the utmost ardor—for a few weeks; then it is forgotten. He is over-exact and conscientious in some respects, and careless in others. It is because of the very richness of his new life. He is not sure of himself. His instincts are as surprising to himself as to anyone else.

This confusion of life may issue in an abnormal self-consciousness and a morbid habit of introspection. It then becomes hard to deal with because the adolescent is naturally secretive, and resents any intrusion upon his personality. It may be questioned, however, whether most of the studies of adolescence have not tended to exaggerate the introspective character of the period.

9. RELIGIOUS AWAKENINGS are natural in early adolescence. In the general expansion of selfhood the religious impulse has its place. As life opens to a larger world, and becomes cognizant of new social and spiritual values, the soul reaches out toward God. This fact is central in our work as Sunday school teachers. We shall think of it more fully in a later lesson.

LESSON VI

LATER ADOLESCENCE

We have agreed to regard the seventeenth birthday as the beginning of later adolescence. This boundary is by no means exact. Yet in every life there is a more or less definite turning-point around sixteen to eighteen. It may be some moral or emotional crisis; or it is beginning work to support oneself, or leaving home to go to college. It may be nothing more than the attainment of full growth in height. To know, in any particular case, just what the turning-point has been, is important if we would really understand the succeeding years.

1. THE DEVELOPMENT OF INDIVIDUALITY is the fundamental characteristic of this period. It has been well called a time of selection and concentration. Early adolescence was a time of expansion. It presented a wealth of possibilities. Later adolescence begins to select from among these possibilities and to concentrate its energies. With choice comes individuality. Lives diverge. Each must have its own work, and each its own quality.

2. THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN INDIVIDUALS is thus the great fact of which we must take account in this period. At no time, of course, are pupils to be treated in the bunch. But now, of all times, individual interests are primary. Each pupil presents a separate problem in himself.

Many factors enter into the determination of individuality. There are differences of heredity and of home environment. There is the natural inborn variation of capacity and temperament. All these differences show themselves with especial definiteness in later adolescence. And they do so because they are called out by differences in external conditions. We do not all have the same opportunities. We cannot all get the same education, or do the same work.

Recent studies show that not more than half the children who enter our city schools finish the work of the grades, and that only one-tenth of them continue to the final year of the high school. It has been estimated, again, that only ten per cent of those who take a high school course go to college or to a professional school. Consider what differences, simply from this standpoint, later adolescence presents. Our pupils divide themselves into at least three great classes:

(1) Those who have gotten only an elementary education, or a part of one, and have gone to work at an early age. They will be more mature than others in some ways, for they have had to face life's serious business. In other respects they are more immature. Their lives are circumscribed; their interests narrow. They cannot appreciate things that appeal strongly to those of more culture.

(2) Those who are now finishing high school, and entering upon work-day life.

(3) Those who are entering college or professional school. For these the period of adolescence will be prolonged. They will broaden and mature intellectually, yet lack development into manhood and womanhood until they finally face the world to make a living.

3. All three classes are experiencing in this period a CONTACT WITH REALITY more direct and definite than at any former time of life. The first two are wage-earners, the former with a little experience, the latter just beginning. They face the realities of business life, with its routine, its competition and its uncompromising standards of efficiency. The college students are leaving home for the first time to enter upon a new life.

4. For most of our pupils later adolescence marks a new stage in life because it brings their first wages. It is the time of TRANSITION FROM ECONOMIC DEPENDENCE TO SELF-SUPPORT AND INDEPENDENCE.

Nature has made ready for the transition. The youth of this age possesses a splendid equipment for work—a high degree of physical energy, strength and comparative maturity of intellect and vigor of will. The physical energy that before was needed for growth, can now be turned into activity and the development of strength. This is the age when athletes develop—great baseball and football players, boxers and runners. The intellectual energy of the period is just as great. Reason and will are maturing, and the mind is restlessly active. Much of the world's best work has been done by young men. The list of its great youths reaches into every sphere.

5. Yet later adolescence is not all success and happiness. It contains its disappointments. It has NEW FORCES TO TEAR LIFE DOWN as well as to build it up.

It is almost inevitably a time of some disillusionment. The hopes of early youth were too extravagant, its ideals loved with a passion that did not see how plodding is the path to realization. The first contact with reality brings something of a shock, a sense of loss. The world is not nearly so responsive as the boy had dreamed, and ideals are not so easy of accomplishment. This making a living seems after all a sordid business. He feels himself to be a mere cog in a vast industrial machinery, and the dull routine of it all oppresses him.

Added to this is the fact that starting to work means generally a breaking of old ties. Even if the boy stays at home and boards with his parents, the home ties are no longer the same. He has acquired a new independence now that he, too, is a bread-winner. The break is most complete, of course, in case of the youth who goes to a new community to make his living among strangers. The freedom, the new temptations, the loneliness of being without friends and with no acquaintances save fellow-workmen—no wonder that the boy in a new town often goes wrong.

Later adolescence is often called the "wild oats" period. It is true, indeed, that most boys now have their fling. It is true, too, that during this period more crimes are committed than at any other time of life. But the wild doings of youth are not usually caused by purposed badness of character. They are often enough a natural result of the conditions of which we have just been thinking.

6. In later adolescence EARLY RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE MAY EASILY FADE, either through disuse or through doubt.

(1) Religious experience may simply fade out of the youth's life. The new freedom permits him to stay away from church, and it gets easy to stay away. Work makes him forget religion; success keeps him from feeling its need.

(2) This is life's doubting time. About the beginning of the twenties many—perhaps most—men and women pass through a period of doubt and negation respecting the truths of religion. There are many causes. The disillusionment of these years often brings a sense of the worthlessness of religious hopes. The college student's first vision of the great truths of science calls in question the religious conceptions he had before acquired. The youth, too, who gets no higher education catches the spirit of the popular science of newspapers and magazines, or is caught by the argument of the labor agitator and socialist leader. Aside from all these external incentives, however, the youth is impelled to doubt from within. His metaphysical instincts have awakened. His reason is active. He must know what he believes, and he must systematize his principles of life. And just because his old religious ideas were the ideas of a child, they will not fall into unity and harmony with one another or with the new conceptions which every day brings. He can no longer be content with the old answer that these are mysteries. Youth acknowledges no mysteries. He turns to doubt.

7. But later adolescence has its RECONSTRUCTIVE FORCES. Great as are the chances for disintegration in these years, life builds itself anew. We note three such forces:

(1) Education. Doubt can be met and resolved by more complete knowledge. Youth is open-minded. Take your young doubter at his word, and meet his intellectual difficulty with an adequate answer, and you need have no fear. He is no skeptic. He seeks the truth, and he will accept it when it comes. Make sure that you know enough to teach him; make sure that you have the truth.

The routine dullness of labor, too, may be banished if the youth but learns more of his task and its bearings upon human life. Disillusionment may become warm-hearted comprehension as one gets to know and his interests widen. We have often wrongly defined culture. It does not mean mere acquaintance with books and paintings, or the ability to talk of historical events. It means breadth of interest—the ability to understand what the next man is doing, and to see the vital relations which his life sustains to mine and mine to his.

(2) Love between the sexes. In the closing years of this period and in the early twenties love for one of the other sex is likely to come into life. The instinct to make a home and to live for one's children is sacred. Too early marriages, of course, are unfortunate; and the conditions of modern life compel the young man of to-day to wait longer than his father did. Yet he is blessed who falls really in love with the right girl. His time of waiting and working will be one of spiritual uplift.

(3) Altruism and social service. The older adolescent is as ready as was the younger to sacrifice self for sake of others—but now he is more practical about it. Altruism is no longer a vague ideal; he seeks definite forms of social service and wants to see results. Give the youth real responsibility; couple him up to the actual work of social betterment, and you need not work to make a man of him. He will make a man of himself.

8. Finally, we dare not forget that the close of later adolescence marks "THE DANGER LINE IN RELIGION." From various studies it seems clear that there is a time of special religious interest at twenty. But less than one-sixth of the conversions studied took place after twenty. One-half of these, again, were before twenty-five. The chances are a thousand to one against conversion after thirty.

LESSON VII

INSTINCT AND HABIT

We have thought of the chief characteristics of each stage in the development of a child. It is now time for us to define more carefully the most fundamental of those laws which are at work in every stage. We have spoken a good deal of instinct, habit and will; and it is highly important that we understand clearly just what we mean by these terms. If a person is what he does, he is what instinct, habit and will make him; for these are the factors that determine one's actions.

1. INSTINCTS are natural tendencies to act in certain ways which result from the inborn organization of the nervous system. An action is instinctive just in so far as one does not need to learn it, or to acquire the tendency to do it.

2. One cannot give a complete LIST OF THE HUMAN INSTINCTS, for it is often hard to draw the line between what is instinctive and what has been learned. Such a list would cover a wide variety of actions, from the simple reflexes of early infancy to the sacrifices of a mother's love. It will be enough for our purpose to reproduce in outline Kirkpatrick's classification.

(1) The individualistic instincts are those which serve to maintain the life of the individual. They are the instincts of self-preservation. Feeding, fear, fighting and anger belong to this class.

(2) The parental instincts are those associated with reproduction and care for the young. Love between the sexes and the love of parent for child are the principal instincts of this class.

(3) The social instincts are those concerned with relations to other persons. This class includes sociability, shyness, sympathy, affection, altruism, modesty, secretiveness, love of approbation, rivalry, jealousy, envy.

(4) The adaptive instincts are those which bring the child into closer contact with his environment, and enable him to adapt himself to his surroundings. Such are imitation, play and curiosity.

(5) The regulative instincts are those concerned with the formation of ideals and the regulation of life in light of them. They are the instincts of morality and religion.

(6) In a miscellaneous group may be placed the instinct to collect things and enjoy ownership, the instinct to construct or destroy, the instinct to express ideas to others, the instinct to love and enjoy beautiful things.

3. We all know enough of these instinctive tendencies to make plain certain GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS OF HUMAN INSTINCTS.

(1) Our instincts are indefinite. They do not provide for any such details of action as do the instincts of lower animals. These are left to be learned through experience.

(2) The instincts are not all present at birth; but they appear, each in its time, as a result of the natural growth of the nervous system.

(3) When instincts do appear, they are often gradual in their development. A child does not begin to act all at once in a totally new way, because a new instinct has grown within him. The instinct itself must come to maturity—in some cases very rapidly, in others more slowly.

(4) The ripening of an instinct means the development of a new aptitude and the awakening of a new interest. The child reaches out eagerly toward anything that may serve as material for the nature-impelled activity within him. This is a fact of the utmost importance to the teacher. "In all pedagogy," says Professor James, "the great thing is to strike the iron while hot, and to seize the wave of the pupil's interest in each successive subject before its ebb has come, so that knowledge may be got and a habit of skill acquired—a headway of interest, in short, secured, on which afterward the individual may float. . . . To detect the moment of the instinctive readiness for the subject is, then, the first duty of every educator."

(5) Instincts are transitory and modifiable. If they are not used, or if their use leads to disagreeable results, they will die out. When they are used, they become set in the definite directions which that use has taken, and so become habits.

No instinct, once used, is after that merely an instinct. It has added two things to itself—a habit and an idea. Just because it has once expressed itself in a certain definite way, it will tend thereafter to express itself in the same way, in accordance with the law of habit. And because its expression has led to some result of which one is conscious, the idea of that result remains in memory and may help to determine future action. The hereditary tendency need no longer be followed blindly. Each time that an instinct is used in action, therefore, it becomes more definite and more intelligent.

Instincts may be controlled, then, in three ways. First, through not using them at all, in which case they in time simply die out. Second, through so using the law of habit as to get them definitely fixed in right directions. Third, through so comprehending their results that one's ideas will help them lead to efficient and right action. Undesirable instincts we shall seek to get rid of by disuse, by punishment, or, best of all, by substitution of another type of action more desirable. Desirable instincts we shall seek to enforce and make permanent by exercise.

4. HABIT is so much discussed from the moral point of view that we are apt to associate the term with moral habits only. But the law of habit is in reality the widest and most fundamental of all the laws of mental life. Without it we could not profit by experience. We should be unable to learn, to remember, to perceive, to understand, to reason, to will, or to act in other than instinctive ways. We owe to it all that we acquire, whether of tendencies, abilities or information, as distinguished from what we possess by native endowment.

The physical basis of habit is found in the fact that nerve cells, like all other living tissue, are modified through use. A nerve cell that has once acted is so changed that it is easier for it to act again in the same way. A functional connection that has once been made by the transmission of a nerve impulse from one cell to another, is likely to be made again. And the more often that connection is made the more definitely established the pathway becomes.

5. THE LAW OF HABIT may be stated in two propositions:
(1) Any connection, once made, tends to recur. Things that have happened together tend in future to recall one another. The feeling or action with which we respond to a given situation tends to be repeated in similar situations.
(2) The degree of the probability of recurrence of a given connection depends upon (a) the frequency, (b) the recency, (c) the intensity, and (d) the resulting satisfaction with which that connection has been made in past experience. The more often repeated, the stronger the habit. Other things being equal, that pathway will be followed which is freshest. When a connection has been established under emotion or with effort or in the full light of attention, it is more likely to persist than one incidentally made. A connection that has resulted pleasantly is more apt to recur than one that has had a disagreeable outcome.

6. THE APPLICATIONS OF THE LAW OF HABIT fall naturally into two groups, according as it deals primarily with ideas or with actions. We form habits of thinking and habits of action.

(1) As applied to thinking, the law of habit lies at the foundation of what is called the association of ideas. Everyone has had the experience of tracing out the links of association which called some idea to mind. You have found yourself thinking of some person or event, humming some tune, or repeating some snatch of poetry; and you have said to yourself, "Now what made me think of that?" And setting yourself to work to recall the course of your reverie, you have been able to see how one thing led to another, till finally there was called up the thought which surprised you.

Ideas present themselves neither as a matter of caprice on the one hand nor as the result of choice on the other. They are called up by the hidden mechanism of habit. What idea will be available in any given situation depends upon what connections that situation or some one of its aspects has had in past experience. And to acquire a new idea in such a way that we shall not only retain but be able to use it, we must establish connections between it and such experiences and other ideas as may in future serve to recall it. In establishing such connections, we may provide for the factor of frequency by repetition; for recency by review; for intensity by clear, distinct, intelligent presentation in the full light of attention; seeking the while to make the experience one of pleasurable satisfaction.

(2) An habitual action is performed with speed and accuracy and with comparatively little fatigue. It is done without conscious attention, and the mind is left free to concern itself with other things while the action goes on. As I write just now, my mind is busy with the ideas I wish to express, while the work of writing, with all the intricate coördination of muscles it involves, is taken care of mechanically by my nervous system. I do not pay the slightest conscious attention to the problem of how to form the letters or how to make my fingers work together. I simply have my thought and will to write it—then habit does the rest. Habit is the executive of my ideas.

7. It is hard to overestimate THE IMPORTANCE AND VALUE OF THE LAW OF HABIT. Even in case of actions determined by deliberate choice habit has at least two functions; first, as law of association it brings ideas before the mind; and, second, as executive it carries out the details of action, once the ideas have decided what to do.

The practical conclusion is obvious. We must begin as early as possible so to use the law of habit that it will help instead of hinder right intellectual and moral growth. If we do not begin right habits early, we shall be growing all the time into wrong ones, which we shall afterwards have to undo before we can establish the better. Further, life does not always remain plastic. Our ways get more and more fixed as we grow older, and it is hard for the mature man to acquire new habits.

Above all we need to remember that, within the limits of our plasticity, the law of habit is always sure to act. It does not concern itself primarily with great moral issues, but with the ordinary things which we are apt to deem trivial. And it has no exceptions. There is only one safe rule to follow: Refrain entirely from actions you do not wish to become habitual. Keep absolutely apart, both in mind and in life, the things you want kept apart. There is no moment of life too valueless, no action or attitude or thought too insignificant for habit to take account of and fasten upon us.

Yet it does not follow that we may rely upon incidental and careless repetition for the establishment of a desired habit or association. Intensity is one of the factors of the law. Just as the utmost care must be used to keep undesirable connections out of life, the most strenuous energy must be put forth to get those that are good. The only safe rule here is: Put all the strength you can into the act that is to become a habit. Center your whole mind upon the fact you wish to remember.

LESSON VIII

THE WILL

1. To understand the will we must begin with the fundamental principle that "all consciousness is motor." EVERY IDEA IS AS WELL AN IMPULSE TO ACT. Left to itself, any thought will issue in movement.

(1) This is a natural consequence of the structure of the nervous system. We have learned how its cells are so coupled up that "action of some sort is the natural outcome of every nerve current, and hence of every sensation and idea."

(2) Many experiments have proved that, even though we check the impulse and prevent the action, we cannot entirely stop the motor discharge. Our sensations and ideas reflect themselves constantly in little starts of the muscles, in changes of heart-beat, breathing, secretion, digestion, and the like.

(3) A hypnotized subject is extremely suggestible. He proceeds to act upon any idea that is put into his mind by the person who hypnotized him. It is because the hypnotic sleep has emptied his mind of ideas, and the one suggested takes complete possession of it.

(4) In normal wide-awake life we often act impulsively. See a magazine that looks interesting, and you take out your purse and buy it. Think of golf, and you start for the links. Some judgment comes to mind, and it is no sooner thought than spoken. Note the condition, however—if left to itself an idea issues in action. If conflicting ideas present themselves, you will not do the impulsive thing. You will not buy the magazine if the thought comes that there are other things more worth reading; you will not play golf if you remember that you have an engagement; you will not express your judgment if it occurs to you that it might hurt someone.

2. THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN IMPULSIVE AND VOLUNTARY ACTION thus becomes plain. An action is impulsive that results from the simple presence and impulse of one idea. When you "speak before you think," it is not that you did not think the judgment you blurt forth, but that you did not think of anything else. An action is voluntary, on the other hand, when more than one idea has been present, offering an alternative, and it is, therefore, the result of choice.

3. Ideas differ greatly, of course, in the DEGREE OF IMPULSIVE STRENGTH which they possess. Some ideas are relatively weak in their push toward action, and others so urgent that they are hard to resist. The rule is that the impulsive strength of an idea depends upon its relation to instincts and habits, and upon the immediacy of the satisfaction it promises. In any normal man, therefore, distinctly rational ideas of action—those derived from farsighted consideration—are relatively cold and weak in impulsive power. Such ideas it requires an effort to hold before the mind in face of the overwhelming surge of stronger impulses.

4. AN ACT OF WILL involves three things: first, the presence before the mind of alternative lines of action; second, the acceptance of some one as our choice; third, the resulting action.

(1) The first factor of an act of will—the presence of alternatives—depends upon the working of the laws of association. You cannot will to do a thing unless you first think of it. And you cannot think of it unless you have had some previous experience to give you some idea of it, and unless the laws of association so work as to bring that idea to mind. How many times we have acted miserably in some situation and afterward were sorry for what we had done—yet we did the best we knew at the moment! We would have chosen the better thing had we thought of it; the trouble was that it did not come to mind at all.

So, after all, one's associations measure the degree of freedom which his will possesses. The man who chooses from a wide range of alternatives is more free than he who can think of but few possible things to say or do. To develop a strong and efficient will one must begin at the foundation by getting the right sort and number of ideas, and by making such associations as shall insure that they will be at hand when he needs them.

There is another side, of course. The will itself helps to determine what ideas shall come before the mind. It is one of the principles of association that of the many possible ideas which might come to mind in any given situation, that is most likely to present itself which is most in accord with the general trend or set of thought for the time.

A purpose, therefore, if one is really in earnest about it, will keep bringing before the mind such ideas as are consistent with itself. But a purpose cannot create ideas. The will can only select the best of the resources which experience has put at its command.

(2) The second factor in willing—the power to choose some one of the alternative ideas—depends on the power to keep that idea before the focus of attention. Just in the degree that one can keep thinking of the right thing and keep other ideas from taking possession of the mind, he is sure to choose the right thing.

Attention may be either spontaneous or voluntary. Spontaneously, we give attention to ideas which appeal to our interests, our instincts, habits or feelings. Voluntarily, we keep the attention upon some idea because of its relation to some other idea or purpose. In general, ideas which appeal spontaneously have a strong impulsive power, while those which appeal more intellectually are relatively weak.

Undoubtedly a great part of our willing results from attention which makes its choice more or less spontaneously—and it is well that it is so. But we all know, as a matter of experience, that one can pull himself together and keep his attention unflinchingly centered on the right thought, to the exclusion of any number of more strongly impulsive ideas that seek to crowd it out.

One condition must be fulfilled if such effort is to be put forth. To command it, an object must seem worth while. It must bring results, or give very definite promise of them. Attention cannot be kept long, even through effort, upon an unchanging and fruitless object. If you begin to act, and results come, it becomes easy. If they do not come immediately, the object must be kept alive by thought about it, picturing in anticipation its many desirable consequences. The man who can think most fruitfully about some purpose, and who can most vividly imagine its concrete results, will be best able to command the effort needed to hold it before the mind. For another, the same idea may simply die out, for the very barrenness of his thought about it.

(3) It is thus in the realm of ideas that the real battles of the will are fought. To get the right ideas before the mind, and, once gotten, to hold them there, are the vital issues of good and efficient willing. After that the action follows as a natural result of the impulsive power which right ideas, like all others, possess.

Two qualifications must be put upon this principle. The action will naturally follow, provided (a) we possess the physical ability and have acquired the skill to do it, and provided (b) we have not gotten into the habit of resting content with mere thinking and feeling. It is easy enough to fall into that attitude of life which assumes that having ideas is an adequate substitute for carrying them out in action, that mere thinking of good deeds can take the place of doing them, and that feeling noble sentiments is a sufficient manifestation of right character. "As a man thinketh, so is he" is a great truth which may by over-emphasis pass into pernicious error. The mere thinker, the dreamer, the sentimentalist, may by inaction sap away even the native motor impulses, to say nothing of failure through practice to acquire strength and skill.

A second counsel, then, to secure strength and efficiency of will, is: Act! Act decisively and promptly when once you have decided what is right. Seek opportunities to apply in actual doing the things you believe. This is a counsel of especial importance in connection with religion; and it has a very practical bearing upon the work of the teacher. Do not exhort your class abstractly without giving them concrete things to do; do not fill them with general truths of morality and religion without helping them to realize those truths in life and service.

5. We have described the will thus far in terms chiefly of its relation to the intellect. BUT ONE'S WILL IS DETERMINED BY HIS FEELINGS AS TRULY AS BY HIS IDEAS. Feeling may enter into each of the three factors of an act of will. As entering into the trend or set of the mind, a feeling helps to bring before one ideas consistent with itself. It keeps the attention naturally and spontaneously upon such as appeal to it. And it gives to the idea it chooses a degree of impulsive strength that carries one into prompt and whole-souled action.

There is a third great counsel, therefore, for the development of a strong and efficient will. To right ideas and habits of decisive action add the power of feeling. Get the affections centered upon things that are worth while. Enlist the heart as well as the mind.

"The expulsive power of a new affection" is life's eternal miracle. Men have sometimes questioned the possibility of conversion. Yet it has been a blessed fact in thousands of lives. Feeling transforms even the working of that hidden mechanism of association that determines one's thoughts. Many a man's real manhood dates from his winning the love of a wife or from the opening to him of the heart of a child. His thoughts, his choices, his acts, all center about his new devotion. Conversions are not unnatural. They are begotten in human relationships as well as divine. Love is, indeed, "the greatest thing in the world." It saves men.

6. THE FINAL SECRET OF STRENGTH OF WILL IS THE GRACE OF GOD. What is true of the feelings begotten in earthly relationships is infinitely more true of those that spring from the contact of the soul with its Father. There is no love like His, no feeling mightier than the sense of His presence and help. Not upon ideas and sheer effort of attention merely, not even upon the strength alone that comes from earthly affection need the wills of men rely; they may lay hold of the love and grace of an almighty God. The experience that Paul records in the seventh chapter of his letter to the Romans is true of all humanity. He who fails of his own strength to free himself from "the law of sin and death" may yet live to "thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord."

LESSON IX

1. THE MORAL NATURE DEVELOPS WITH EXPERIENCE. A little child has at first no will and character of his own. He lacks knowledge and self-control. He is the creature of his instincts, desirable and undesirable, good and bad. Morality develops as he becomes able to see a difference between a better and a worse way, and chooses one or the other.

It is true that the moral nature is instinctive. Without an inborn capacity, no child could be trained to be a moral being. We possess an innate power to transcend in vision that which is and to apprehend that which ought to be. We are impelled by a law of our own nature to form ideals and to feel obligations.

But just what in particular one's ideals shall be or just what obligations he shall feel is left to be determined by experience. Habits and feelings, environment and training, ideas gained for himself or acquired from others—all these go to shape the child's developing sense of right and wrong.

2. THE CHILD IS A NATURAL LAWMAKER AND LAW-OBSERVER. Will implies the recognition of law. When he cries in order to get something, it is because crying has brought it before. No matter how much you tell him not to cry, or assure him that crying will not bring what he wants; if finally you relent and crying does bring it, he will continue to use crying as a means whereby to attain his purposes. The law he made for himself out of his experience is much more real than the law you laid down in words.

By law, it is plain, we here mean a rule or principle for voluntary action. As experience grows, the child makes rules for himself, part consciously and part unconsciously. There are four great sources from which he derives such rules. We may call them THE NATURAL ROOTS OF LAW:

(1) Habit and association—the experienced connection between some action and its result. "If I want some result, I must do what brought it before," is the principle upon which the child acts, though, of course, he does not avow it to himself in so many words.

(2) Imitation—the observed behavior of others, with its results. "If I want the results they reached, I must do as they did."

(3) Authority—the commands and wishes of other persons, enforced by the pleasure or pain of personal relations. "If I want to please them and avoid the results of their displeasure, I must do as they say."

(4) Social initiative—the laws of a social group having common aims and interests. "If I want to share with the rest, I must do my share."

Roughly speaking, the order given is the order of appearance of these roots, and the order in which they reach the culmination of their control. Habit and association are present from the first. Imitation appears the latter half of the first year, and reaches the climax of control from the fourth to the seventh years. Authority appears as soon as the child becomes sensitive to the personal attitudes of others, and its control culminates from six to ten. Social initiative begins whenever the child first feels its helpfulness in a common task or play, and assumes constantly larger control with the coming of adolescence. Of course, none of these roots cease to be productive of laws, nor should they. Habit, imitation and authority continue to the end of life.

3. We may divide these roots of law into two classes. The first three may be called ADAPTIVE ROOTS, and the last the INITIATIVE ROOT. Through the first three, the child adapts himself to the conditions of his environment, physical and social; through the last, he helps initiate laws as a member of the group which forms them.

(1) Throughout early and middle childhood, morality develops mainly from the adaptive roots—habit and association, imitation and authority. The rules of action which the child forms for himself express his sense of the conditions which are imposed upon him from without. His laws are mere statements of natural consequences. An action is good to him just in so far as it brings a pleasurable result, and bad if the result is disagreeable. He has no conception of its real moral quality. He knows no other obligation than that pleasure is desirable and pain and unhappiness to be avoided. He looks upon punishment as simply a particular sort of natural consequence—a way in which those in authority visit upon him their displeasure. He has no idea that it may be for sake of reform or prevention; it is rather natural retribution. Threats and promises mean little to him; it is what happens, rather than what you say will happen, that shapes his laws and actions. He thinks only of externals—the outward act and its result—not of inward motives. His laws are literal and particular; he is unable to penetrate to the general principles involved.

(2) In later childhood and adolescence, morality becomes more and more largely a matter of social initiative. The inward mandate of the newly awakened social sense carries with it an obligation that the pressure of external conditions could never make one feel. Laws become more than mere statements of natural consequences. They tell what ought to be. Life becomes genuinely moral.

4. MORAL TRAINING MUST GO ALONG WITH MORAL IN-

STRUCTION. What we tell a child about right and wrong has, beyond question, a great deal to do with his moral development. He has constant need of instruction, "precept upon precept, line upon line." But he is all the time working over his experience into laws and ideas of his own; and these determine the attitude he takes toward our teaching and the way he understands it. Parents and teachers should so manage the conditions of his life that the laws which grow from these natural roots of which we have been thinking, may illumine and enforce their instruction, rather than contradict and weaken it. When there is conflict, the precept generally loses out and the law from life abides.

(1) In early and middle childhood, training must be mainly through the pressure of external conditions; in later childhood and adolescence, it must be through an appeal to individual initiative. This opposition, of course, is not absolute. One cannot draw sharp lines. The child who is brought up to help and to feel some share of responsibility in the family life will early manifest something of social initiative. The adaptive roots, on the other hand, persist in the later stage of moral development. They are caught up into the higher motive and transformed. Habit and association come to deal with social results. Imitation becomes idealistic. Authority takes the form of public opinion.

(2) Training upon the adaptive basis requires of us consistency and inflexibility. We are not to force the child to do right; we are to confront him with such conditions that he will want to do right. We must make his environment, physical and social, express just that law and order that we wish him to make a part of himself.

(3) Training upon the basis of social initiative requires us to share the life of the child and let him share ours. Give children something real to do—something in which they feel that you are as vitally interested as they—and work with them toward its accomplishment. They crave fellowship and responsibility.

5. MORAL INSTRUCTION MUST GO ALONG WITH MORAL TRAINING. This is the other side of the truth. However sound the environment, physical and social, in which we place our children, however worthy the example we set them, however helpful the personal associations into which we bring them, we will not rely upon these alone. We will not remain dumbly inarticulate in their presence as they form for themselves the laws of life. It is our privilege to help them to understand their experience in light of the accumulated experience of the race. We shall seek to give them true ideas and to beget within them high ideals as well as to train them in right ways of action. What Patterson DuBois has called "the natural way in moral training" includes nurture by light and food as well as by atmosphere and exercise.

This is not the place to discuss methods of moral instruction. Enough to say that we shall use both the indirect method of story, biography, history and art, and the direct method of precept and principle. We shall seek to stir the feelings and to enlist the will as well as to enlighten the mind.

6. THE GOAL OF ALL MORAL TRAINING AND INSTRUCTION IS THE EMANCIPATION OF THE CHILD. The life that began in absolute dependence and was progressively shaped by habit and authority, custom and group-law, must become free and responsible. The child is to become a person, in the full meaning of that term. He is to become able to prove all things for himself and of his own will to choose and hold fast to that which is good.

7. THE GOAL OF MORAL EDUCATION CANNOT BE FULLY REACHED EXCEPT BY THE GRACE OF GOD. A merely moral education—one without religion—fails to attain its own end. It lacks power and direction. It potters about in proverbs and casuistries, and sways this way or that as goes public opinion. He only is truly free who has accepted God's will for his life and whom the love of Christ constraineth.

1. RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE DEVELOPS WITH PERSONALITY AS A WHOLE. Belief is a matter of intellect, feeling and will. Religion changes as the intellect matures, as feeling deepens and the will gives life direction. One's religion is always a reflection of what one is. The religion of a child must be different from that of a youth, and the youth's again from that of a man.

This will not be understood as a denial of religion's instinctive character. Like morality, religion rests upon an inborn capacity. God has made us for Himself, as Augustine says, so that we can find no rest save in Him. But, like the moral and other human instincts, the religious instinct is indefinite and modifiable, and must be shaped by experience.

We will not be understood, again, to deny the supernatural character of religion. It is no product of natural forces merely, or of coöperative human wills. "By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God." The God whom we have come to know through Jesus Christ is a Father who helps His children to newness of life. Of His Spirit we are born again.

In this chapter, therefore, we state but half the truth, when we describe the bearing upon the religious life of childhood and youth of those natural forces and laws which condition the development of personality as a whole. Beneath them and through them there works the Spirit of God. And we do Him little honor if we insist that He can so work only in certain particular ways or at this or that special time.

2. THE RELIGION OF EARLY AND MIDDLE CHILDHOOD IS ONE OF NATURE AND OF HOME. There are four chief factors which contribute to the development of religion in the life of a child:

(1) His interest in nature. His unwearied senses; his eager questions about the causes of things and their purposes; his personifying imagination; his delight in stories of the miraculous and supernatural—throw his mind open to the conception of God as the Creator and Sustainer of the world about him.

(2) His credulity and faith. At first the child accepts without question whatever we tell him of God simply because he believes anything. As rational curiosity develops and he begins to put things together, he carries out to many a naïve and fantastic conclusion the things that he has been told about God. Such conclusions are neither to be feared nor laughed at. They result from the child's attempt to make his ideas coherent, with his literalness and inability to comprehend our figures of speech. We should meet them by a simple explanation of the truth, not by a reiteration of figures or by telling the child that he will understand better when he grows up. Certainly they need not be taken, as they are by some, as an argument against giving children any religious ideas. Their reasoning is similarly naïve concerning every-day things.

If parents meet the naïve questions of childhood with the simple truth, the child's credulity becomes faith. He comes to know whom he can believe. The parent can do no greater service to the religious development of the child than so to meet the dawning reason as to beget perfect faith in the parent. He thus lays the best of foundations for the child's faith in God—the heavenly Father.

(3) His affection and sensitivity to the personal attitudes of others. The child's capacity to love and to be loved is of the very heart of religion. To the end of his life his acquaintance with the God who is Love will be influenced by the response which his affections meet in these early days. His conception of God as Father and of himself as God's child will reflect the life of the home.

(4) His imitation and suggestibility. The child's impressionable nature gains much that he does not understand, and that we ought not to try to make him understand until he seeks to know. Our reverent worship, the prayers and songs of God's house, its solemn ordinances, its music, its beautiful windows and stately architecture—most of all, the quiet devotion of the family altar—all these enter into the very making of his soul.

So we see the justification of our brief characterization of the religion of childhood: it is a religion of nature and of home. The child's interest centers in the great world that lies open to his senses, and he seeks its Maker. And the content of his religion depends largely upon the home. It is what father and mother make it.

3. THE RELIGION OF LATER CHILDHOOD IS ONE OF LIFE AND LAW IN LIFE. The child's interest is in God's dealings with men, rather than in His works in nature.

(1) The social instincts bring a new sense of law. Conscience awakens. Right is conceived, no longer as from an external authority, but as resting upon inward grounds of obligation.

(2) The development of the historical sense begets a new interest in life as revealed in biography and history. It is the time, we remember, of hero-worship. Tales of the mighty doings of great men are eagerly sought and read.

(3) The religion of the period, therefore, centers about God as revealing Himself to men. The child thinks of God the Law-giver and Redeemer, rather than God the Creator. His is a God of Right and of Might, who moves in human history and accomplishes His will through the lives of the great heroes of faith.

(4) We may remind ourselves of three things that make this period especially significant in religious education: its plasticity to habit, its quick and retentive memory, and the fact that life's decision time commonly comes at its close.

4. IN ADOLESCENCE RELIGION BECOMES PERSONAL. In later as well as in early childhood, interest in religion is objective. The child learns about God, His works and His life with men. But now religion comes home to the will. It presents itself as a way of life, to be accepted or rejected. God claims the soul that is His.

Many studies have been made of adolescent religion. They show, as we should expect, that the first definite awakening of personal interest in religion comes usually at the beginning of the period. At twelve or thirteen most children who have been brought up under religious influences, desire to join the church. Coe reports: "Among 512 officers of Young Men's Christian Associations the average age of the first deep religious impression appears to have been 13.7 years. Among 99 men who were studied with reference to all their periods of special religious interest, as many awakenings of the religious sense occurred at twelve and thirteen as at sixteen and seventeen. A recent study shows that in a group of 'growth cases,' reaching into the hundreds, the most distinctive period of spontaneous interest falls at the age of twelve."

There is a second period of religious awakening at sixteen and seventeen. Forty-one of the 99 men studied by Coe experienced an increase of religious interest at this age—the same number as at the earlier period. At twenty again, there seems to be a third such awakening.

Seventy-six per cent of the religious awakenings reported by these men came in the ages from twelve to twenty, and 50 per cent in the years named as times of special interest—twelve and thirteen, sixteen and seventeen, and twenty. Other studies have tended to confirm the conclusions drawn from these figures.

When we inquire into the age of conversion, the question is different. We are asking now at what age the decision is most apt to be made. As might be expected, Coe found that conversions were most frequent in the three periods of special religious awakening; but the proportion is not the same. There were more at sixteen and seventeen than in the earlier period, and many less in the last period than in either of the other two. Collating a number of studies, he found that the average age of conversion for 1784 men was 16.4 years. Hall adds data from several sources which show that, of a total of 4054 men, 1329 were converted at sixteen, seventeen and eighteen, and 3053 at ages from twelve to twenty, with only 705 at twenty-one and over. Haslett summarizes a total of 6641 conversions of both sexes, of which 5054 were at ages from twelve to twenty. Fifteen hundred and twenty-seven were at sixteen and seventeen, and only 1039 from twenty-one to thirty-four.

(1) Decision at twelve or thirteen is usually the natural result of a normal religious nurture and of social suggestion. The problem is to care for the spiritual activity and further growth in grace of those who make their personal decision at this time.

(2) Conversions at sixteen and seventeen are more apt to be of the emotional type. There is a conflict of impulses and feelings, with a final triumph of those that lead to God.

(3) Conversions at nineteen or twenty are apt to be of a more intellectual and practical type. It is because new insight has come or some doubt has been resolved; or because the youth reaches the practical conviction that he needs religion as part of life's equipment.

"So far as the beginning of the divine life is described in the Scriptures, it is described in figurative language, as doubtless it must be. It is a begetting by God (1 Pet. 1:23; 1 John 4:7); a birth (John 3:3; James 1:18); a creation (2 Cor. 5:17); a resurrection (Eph. 2:1). From among these expressive metaphors that of birth has been selected for prominence, and the beginning of the divine life is oftenest spoken of as regeneration. The presence of the others should warn us against thinking that this is the only allowable name; yet there is good reason why this should be the favorite name for describing the beginning of the divine life from the divine side. The same change viewed from the human side is popularly called conversion.

"There is no difficulty in seeing what the nature of this experience must be. The beginning of the divine life, being an entrance into personal union and fellowship with Christ and so with God, is a moral change; it is a change of character and ruling disposition. It is not a gift of new faculties, or a creation of something additional in a man, but an awakening of new dispositions which prepare him for fellowship with God. And since the new life of divine fellowship is a life of holy love, the beginning of the new life consists in the awakening of holy love in the soul. Here appears the fitness of the name regeneration. God by His own action produces another like Himself; He brings into being one who is in the spiritual sense His offspring, His child. A man is "born again," made a new creature by a new beginning in the soul's life, whereby God produces a life morally similar to His own. The direct agent in effecting such a change in a man is God in man, the Holy Spirit."

5. We have now reached the close of our study of The Pupil. We may summarize its results in a brief statement of the aims of our work in each of the several departments of the Sunday school.

The fundamental aim of every Sunday school class is the same—the salvation, and the moral and spiritual development of the pupil. We seek to bring those we teach to a knowledge of God as revealed in Jesus Christ, and to loyal, whole-hearted service in His kingdom. But this general aim can be realized only in so far as we meet the particular interests and needs of the pupil at each stage of his development. Each department of the Sunday school, therefore, will have its specific aim.

(1) The Beginners are getting their first acquaintance with God as the loving Father. The child's life in the normal home and the eager reaching out of his senses toward nature about him form the apperceptive basis upon which we must build.

(2) The meaning which the Primary pupil gets out of the stories we tell him is determined by the new ideas he is gaining in public school and by the distinction he is coming to make between the world of fact and that of the imagination. We must seek to coördinate our teaching with that of the school, and so to present the simple truths about God, His works in nature and His dealings with men, that the child may feel them to have a place in the world of fact.

(3) The Junior apperceives the truth in light of his social instincts and his hero-worship. Our teaching must center about the moral life, as commanded in God's law, and revealed in the person of Jesus and in the heroes of the faith. We seek to present the ideal of moral heroism, to deepen the sense of responsibility for the right, and to give a vision of the glory of service.

(4) The work of the Sunday school centers about the Intermediate department. It is the decision time. We shall bend all our energies first to secure a decision for Christ as personal Saviour and a consecration of heart and will to God through Christ; then to help the pupil carry out his decision in actual living and doing.

(5) Our aim in the Senior department is (a) to meet the doubts and intellectual difficulties which are often characteristic of later adolescence; (b) to help the pupil clear up his moral and religious conceptions and formulate his beliefs; (c) to train for definite and specific service. We shall seek earnestly for the conversion of those who have not yet dedicated themselves to God.

(6) The courses of the Adult department should be wholly elective and largely of a practical character. No one ought ever to graduate from the Sunday school. We all need it for the sake of the spiritual nourishment of stated Bible study, and for the maintenance of the intellectual vigor of our faith. More than this, the Adult department has wonderful possibilities as a school of practical religion.

FOR OBSERVATION

1. Show how religious experience develops with personality; or how one's religion reflects his total personality.
2. Show how the child's religion reflects his life in the home.

4. Children's spontaneous prayers.
5. Remember your own religious ideas as a child.
6. Cases of awakened interest in religion in later childhood
7. Remember your own periods of religious awakening, their times and occasions.
8. Make a list of conversions that you can learn about, and the ages at which they took place. See whether or not they bear out the statements of the text, both as to times and as to character.

THE TEACHER

THE TEACHER'S WORK AND PREPARATION

We are now to devote ten lessons to a study of the work of The Teacher. We shall deal, not with the particular devices of method which have been found effective in each department of the Sunday school, but with those general principles that underlie all teaching. We shall thus lay a foundation for the courses in special methods which are to come later.

I. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL IS A SCHOOL. Its work is educational. It is a place of instruction. We are put here to teach; the pupils to learn. Our sessions center about the lesson.

There will be worship, of course; but this is not the children's church. There will be giving; but we are not organized to raise and bestow money. There will be social fellowship; but the Sunday school is not a club. These things have place in our work just because they too are educational. As training, they supplement instruction, and are essential factors in the spiritual development of those we teach. But they are means to an end; and they are subordinate to the chief means which the Sunday school employs—definite instruction in the Bible.

"Such a conception of the work of the Sunday school recognizes the peculiar relation of our religion to the Bible, and the necessity that underneath worship and devotion, ethical instruction and the persuasion of the will, missions and philanthropy, there shall be a firm foundation of knowledge of that pre-eminent revelation of God which is the source and support of Christianity. It recognizes the need of one service, which, having the same ultimate aim as that which is sought in all the activities of the church, shall seek that end specifically and mainly by instruction in the Bible.”*

2. THE BIBLE IS THE CHIEF TEXT-BOOK OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL. It is God’s Word—the record of His life with men and His revelation of Himself to them. It shows us Jesus, “the Way, the Truth and the Life.” There is no other such book.

Two misconceptions of the Bible’s pre-eminence are possible, however, which we must be careful to avoid:

(1) The Bible is not the sole text-book of the Sunday school. You need helps for its interpretation—the best that scholarship can afford. There is no class more barren than one that accepts too literally the well-meant but misleading statement that “the Bible is its own best commentary.” You must supplement its teachings, again, with lessons drawn from human life, and, especially in the lower grades, from God’s other book of nature. There should be definite lessons and courses in applied Christianity—in missions and in social betterment. Instruction in the history and doctrines of the Church, moreover, should be a part of the organized work of the Sunday school, not something extraneous to it.

(2) The fact that the Bible is God’s Word does not relieve us from using our minds to understand it. It is no magic book, with a message that miraculously imprints itself upon idle souls. It is true that spiritual truth must be spiritually discerned. Yet the Bible is to be understood as is any other book—by earnest and patient study in light of historical conditions and literary form. And we shall teach the Bible rightly just in so far as we follow those principles which the nature of the mind itself sets for the teaching of any subject.

3. FOUR FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES underlie all teaching. They are implied in what we have learned in the study of The Pupil, concerning the development of personality. We need only bring them together here, and give them definite statement.

(1) The principle of SELF-ACTIVITY. Not what you tell a pupil, but what he thinks as the result of your words; not what you do for him, but what he does for himself; not the impression, but his reaction upon it—determine his development. You cannot put ideas into his head; your words are but symbols of the ideas that are within your own. He must interpret the symbols and from them construct his own ideas. Teaching succeeds only in so far as it enlists the activity of the pupil. He must think for himself. It is your business to wake him to thought, to engage his interest, to get him to want ideas, and to set before him the material out of which he can make them.

(2) The principle of APPERCEPTION. The pupil never makes an idea wholly of new material. He understands the new only by relating it to the old. The body of any new idea, therefore, is old; it is made of material that has come from his own experience, reshaped and altered only enough to take in the new item. The pupil's instincts, his habits, his old ideas, determine the very meaning for him of any new impression. If you do not know what they are, you cannot be sure that he is getting the meaning you intend.

The teacher must present the truth in terms drawn from the pupil's own knowledge and experience.

(3) The principle of ADAPTATION. The pupil is growing and developing. As life goes on, experience widens, powers mature, instincts ripen and petrify into habits, interests come and go. We remember Professor James' striking statement of these facts and his conclusion that "in all pedagogy the great thing is to strike the iron while hot, and to seize the wave of the pupil's interest in each successive subject before its ebb has come." Teaching must appeal to what is within the pupil; its matter and its method, therefore, must constantly be adapted to his changing powers and interests.

(4) The principle of ORGANIZATION. No bit of teaching, whether that of an hour, a day or a year, should stand alone. It must be coupled up with what went before and what comes after—and it must be coupled up, remember, in the pupil's mind, not simply in our own. Further, the teaching as a whole must head up into something; it must have a goal and work steadily toward it. The one-sidedness of the principle of adaptation is here corrected. We must do more than simply feed the changing interests; we must feed them to some purpose. The goal of education cannot be left to the child's spontaneous instincts, however largely they determine its matter and method at any particular stage. Teaching aims at an organization of ideas and powers within the pupil; and it must work toward this in an orderly and consistent way.

4. THE TEACHER'S PREPARATION for each Sunday's lesson involves four items: (1) That he get the meaning of the lesson and master its material; (2) that he choose an aim for the teaching of the lesson; (3) that he lay out a plan for the teaching of the lesson and organize his material according to this plan; (4) that he plan definitely how to lead his pupils to apply and express this and other lessons in Christian life and service.

5. First of all, THE TEACHER MUST GET THE MEANING OF THE LESSON. No comment or dogma or application is of importance as compared with what the writer himself actually meant to say. That is fundamental. It must come first.

Three conditions must be fulfilled if the teacher is really to get the meaning of the lesson:

(1) He must study it in light of its literary form and its relation to the book from which it is taken. Despite the unity of revelation that runs through it all, the Bible is not one book, but many. It contains histories and biographies, letters and poems, dramas and lyric idylls, the writings of prophets and the pithy sayings of wise men. We should study, not passages only, but books. The teacher ought always to read the whole book from which the lesson is taken, with a view to its literary form and the intent of the author. Only through this knowledge of the whole can he grasp the full meaning of the part.

(2) He must study it in light of the historical circumstances under which it was said or written. Eternal as is the truth of God's revelation in the Bible, it had its times and places. The prophets spake, not to future generations, but to the men of their day. They revealed God's will in a nation's crises. St. Paul wrote to particular churches and to individual men, and because he had something specific to say to them. The teacher needs both knowledge and imagination. He must catch the point of view of the man who wrote the words he studies, and of those for whom they were written. He must understand what they meant then, if he is rightly to interpret them now.

(3) He must study it sympathetically. Without the vision of faith, he will not comprehend it. "Spiritual sympathy is indispensable for the sound interpretation of books written to convey spiritual truth. As the Bible is intended to set forth religious truth, so must it be studied in a religious spirit."* Also see Addenda on page 166.

6. THE TEACHER SHOULD CHOOSE AN AIM FOR THE TEACHING OF THE LESSON. The ultimate aim is always the same—the spiritual quickening and development of the pupil. But it is not enough to purpose this in a general way; he should plan just how to make this particular lesson work toward that end in the life of these particular pupils.

(1) He should choose a single aim for each lesson. Have one purpose, one central thought; and stick to it. Some teachers go at a lesson piecemeal. They have a pupil read a verse; then ask, "Now, what do we learn from that?" There follows a discussion of the spiritual truth supposed to be contained in that verse, and its application to life; then the next verse is taken up in the same way, and so on to the end. This is not teaching a lesson; it is rather a mulling over of as many lessons as there are verses in the assignment for the day. The unity of the passage is lost. It is treated as a mere collection of separate texts.

Such a procedure is wrong; first, because it embodies a false conception of the Bible. The Bible is not such a collection of texts. Its books are coherent. Its histories have connection; its letters are sensible; its prophecies sane and sober. If the teacher, in fact, has fulfilled the conditions set down above, and has gotten the actual meaning of the lesson, he will not think of teaching in this scattered way. The passage will have a point for him, and he will direct his teaching toward making that point clear to his pupils.

Such a procedure is wrong, again, because it is not good

* Burton and Mathews, "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday School," p. 24.

A. B. P. S.

teaching. It lacks unity and force. The pupil carries away nothing just because too much has been given. He does not get the point because confused by too many points. Do not use every thought that the lesson suggests. Pick out only what you need to develop the main theme. Not "Is this thought good?" but "Will it help my pupils to grasp the point of the day's lesson?" must be the criterion.

(2) Not every lesson need aim directly at the formulation of some moral or spiritual truth. The fact that every lesson can yield such a conclusion does not prove that it ought. Nor does the fact that our general aim is spiritual imply that each single passage should be studied with reference to its separate spiritual message.

Such a procedure may, in fact, hinder the fullest realization of our ultimate aim. It is yet a piecemeal method of studying the Bible, less objectionable than the verse-by-verse method only because the pieces are not quite so tiny. It conveys no idea of the continuity of events or of the onward movement of the Spirit in the minds of men. And it begets within the pupil a habit of mind which will keep him from looking beyond the single lesson for the truth. He will not organize rightly what he learns. He will not grasp the great things of God's teaching. He will study the Bible in cross-section, and miss the perspective of a third dimension.

Some lessons are but links in a chain, items in the development of a truth so great that many lessons are needed to bring it out. Our immediate aim in such a lesson is intellectual rather than moral or spiritual. We seek, not to jump at applications, but to prepare for other lessons and to organize the data from which the spiritual conclusion will ultimately be drawn. The teacher ought squarely to face the issue: "Is this lesson one for conclusion and application, or for preparation and organization? Is it complete in itself, or a part with other lessons of a larger whole? Shall I finish it off at the end of the period and start again next Sunday; or shall I make it point on to the coming lesson and remain incomplete without it?"

(3) He should aim to present, as simply and directly as possible, the meaning of the Bible passage itself. This is implied in all that we have said. It is the sum and substance of the whole matter. Having himself gotten the actual meaning of the Bible writer, it is the teacher's business to make the pupil see that meaning. His work is expository. He is there to find and to make clear the truth.

(4) He should seek that "point of contact" which will best bring this truth home to the minds and hearts of his particular pupils. He must present it in terms that they can understand; he must apply it to their interests and aspirations; he must make it find place in the body of their ideas and fulfill its function in the organization of their powers and the development of their personalities. This means that the teacher must know his pupils quite as well as he does the material of the lesson. His aim should bring the two together.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

Each member of the training class should seek to apply the principles of each of these lessons on "The Teacher" to some concrete situation. Get in mind a particular class—either the one you are now teaching, or the one to which you belong as a member, or one which you have taught or to which you have belonged. Then, in writing, answer the question of the week, as it bears upon that particular class. Your answer should be anywhere from three hundred to five hundred words in length. Be sure to state in it the age and sex of the class.

The leader of the training class should require these papers to be handed in week after week; and he should read and grade them carefully, and make them the basis of further discussion if he finds it practicable to do so. With this in view he may find it wise to have them mailed to him a couple of days before the meeting of the class each week.

In connection with this first lesson the topic of the paper is: The formulation of a lesson aim. Choose some one of the sections of Biblical material in the following list; study it till you get its meaning, and set down in writing what you conceive that meaning to be. Then, in writing, describe your class, in terms of age, sex, the ideas that they already possess, and the problems that they are facing. Decide then whether or not this is a good lesson to teach to that particular class. If you decide that it is, formulate in writing your aim in teaching this particular lesson to that class. If you decide that it is not, give in writing your reasons for that decision.

Note that the following is not a list of lesson subjects. It only indicates in a general way the sections of material from which you are asked to choose. The lesson subject you should formulate for yourself.

Abraham offering Isaac; Joseph and his brethren; The baby Moses; The golden calf; Nathan and David; Josiah's reform; Isaiah 53; The work of Nehemiah; Daniel in the den of lions; The book of Ruth; The book of Job; The book of Jonah; The birth of Jesus; The temptation of Jesus; The prodigal son; The good shepherd; The great supper; The laborers in the vineyard; Pentecost; Peter and Cornelius; Paul at Athens; Romans 8; 1 Corinthians 13; Hebrews 11.

LESSON II

METHODS OF TEACHING

I. THE TEACHER SHOULD LAY OUT A PLAN FOR THE TEACHING OF THE LESSON. He dare not rely upon the inspiration of the moment. For sake of economy of time and definiteness of presentation, as well as to insure the interest and co-operation of the class, he should organize his material beforehand and plan the steps to be taken in the development of the theme.

The details of this plan will depend, of course, upon his general method of conducting the class. The teacher of beginners or primary pupils will use the story method. Of this we shall think later. In the junior and higher departments the teacher may use the recitation method, the discussion method, or a combination of the two. In some adult classes the lecture method has been found profitable. In this lesson we shall consider each of these methods, with its advantages and difficulties.

2. THE RECITATION METHOD involves three steps: (1) assignment of the lesson; (2) the pupil's study; (3) the recitation itself. It enlists the co-operation of teacher and pupil. Each must do his part. The pupil must study and recite; the teacher must assign the lesson and conduct the recitation.

Some of us may have had the fortune to be in a class where the teacher asked only the questions printed in the lesson leaf. They went something like this: Where did Peter and John go at the ninth hour? (v. 1). What time was this? (see Notes). Why did they go? Whom did they see there? (v. 2). How long had he been lame? What did he ask of them? (v. 3). What did Peter say? (v. 4). What did the lame man expect? (v. 5). What did Peter then say? (v. 6). What then? (v. 7). What did the lame man do? (v. 8). The teacher put these questions to the members of the class in turn; and each answered by reading the passage indicated.

That was not a recitation at all. It was simply nibbling at a few pre-digested Bible verses. Neither the teacher nor the pupils did anything except look at the page and open their mouths. There was no thinking going on. There had been no study on the part of the pupils; and there was no evidence of it on the part of the teacher.

Our example is purposely somewhat extreme. No lesson leaf would ask quite such feeble questions, or indicate so precisely the answer to every one. No teacher of any common sense would do nothing more than read off for answers such a list. But most pupils will, if they get a chance, do exactly what those pupils did. So long as their lesson leaves are open at all, they will "look up" the answer to any question addressed to them, and read it, either from the verses of the lesson or from the editor's notes. Now and then a pupil is to be found who will put on an air of knowledge by paraphrasing the answer he finds in the book; but most of them are not ashamed frankly to read it.

Now it may be quite legitimate for pupils to do this; but it is not reciting. The recitation method holds the pupil responsible for some definite piece of work, which he is to do outside of the recitation period, and upon which he is to report in class. It demands that he study.

It exacts yet more of you—the teacher. It makes you study two lessons for every Sunday—that upon which the class recites and that which you assign for the coming week. It makes you divide the teaching period into two parts—one devoted to the recitation and one to the assignment of the next lesson. It confronts you, moreover, with two practical difficulties:

(1) How shall you get the pupil to study? That is a hard problem, and one upon which any teacher of experience speaks with becoming humility. (a) You should show him how to study. Public school teachers are just finding out that it pays to take stated periods to study with their children and to teach them how to go at their lessons. (b) Your assignment of the lesson for the coming Sunday should be such as to arouse his interest and give him a motive for study. It should make him feel that the lesson contains something that he wants to know. (c) You should at times assign a definite task to each pupil, for which you will hold him responsible. It is not enough to say that you expect each to study the lesson, or even to answer the questions of the text-book, or to do whatever writing or picture-pasting or map-drawing it requires. There should now and then be some special bit of work for each, the results of which he is to bring back to class next Sunday. (d) Above all, never assign anything that you will not call for at the next period; never fail to call for and use everything assigned. This is a rule that will often be hard to live up to; but you must hold to it as rigidly as you can. It is the one that clinches all the rest. Laxity here takes vitality out of the pupil's work, and soon begets carelessness and indifference.

(2) How shall you retain the attention and interest of the pupil throughout the recitation? It is quite possible that your very success in getting the pupil to study may be your undoing in the recitation period. If you do nothing more than hear a recitation, testing knowledge and receiving reports on tasks assigned, the period will be very monotonous and dry to the pupil—and more so the more thoroughly he has studied the lesson. He may feel that he is getting nothing out of the recitation period itself.

Testing, therefore, is only the beginning of your work in the recitation. You must be able to use the pupil's answers and reports in a further development of the lesson. You must be able to explain, illustrate, amplify, and finally sum up the results of their work and your own. The ideal recitation is in fact co-operative. All have studied a common assignment which becomes the basis of discussion. To that discussion each pupil brings his special contribution. The teacher, too, makes his contribution to the common store, and with tact and ingenuity weaves together what all have brought into a unified development of the truth. At the end the pupils know the truth, for they have themselves seen it grow in the discussion of the hour; and they feel that it is their own, for each has had his share in its development. The recitation has been social; the pupils feel the glow of helpfulness, and go home with an added zest to prepare to do their part on the coming Sunday.

3. THE DISCUSSION METHOD develops the lesson within the class period. By skillful questions, the teacher sets the pupil to thinking and gets him to express his thought, then uses it as a basis for further question and discussion. The truth of the lesson is thus gradually educed. The teacher draws the pupil out. The work of the hour is constructive, and, in the primary sense of the word, educative.

The great virtue of the method is its live and co-operative character. There is nothing mechanical or rigid about it. Things keep moving. It demands the activity both of teacher and pupil. The class goes away with no ready-made information loosely lodged in their heads, but with ideas of their own making.

But this method, too, has its difficulties and dangers:

(1) It is a mistake to attempt to educe particular facts

by discussion. You must tell them to the pupil, or he must find them out somewhere.

Socrates' method of questioning and discussion has long been pointed to as an ideal. It is true that he was a master at stirring his hearers to think for themselves. We can learn much from him and his questions. But there is a great difference of presupposition between Socrates' method and our own. He believed that all truth dwelt within the soul of the pupil himself. He held that knowledge is in reality recollection. He thought that the human soul had lived before coming to this earth, just as it will live hereafter; and that the truths known in that former existence had left their print upon it. Truth lies, therefore, implicit within one; to know is but to become clearly conscious of one's own latent memories. The duty of the teacher is to help bring them to the light.

We do not believe in this doctrine. Facts, we now know, come to us from without. Men might have peered forever into their own souls and might have discussed with one another until doomsday, without ever learning the simple fact that salt is made of sodium and chlorine. Someone had to observe that. You can never by questioning get out of a pupil the fact that Peter was a fisherman, or that Paul was born at Tarsus, unless that fact has first been put into him.

You waste time, then, in attempting to pull facts out of the class that they do not know, or to create them by discussion. The province of the method is the organization of facts. You are to make the pupil think about the facts of the lesson, relate them to one another, draw inferences from them and arrive at new truths. But the facts themselves he must find out, either in his previous study, or by looking them up as you ask for them, or by having others tell him. Any other method than previous study, moreover, is poor economy. Every pupil should come with the main facts of the lesson already fixed in his mind. You will rapidly question the class upon them; and then you have a common basis upon which discussion may proceed. You are ready to go on, to inquire into matters that have escaped notice, to round out the pupil's knowledge and to develop the truth of the lesson.

(2) There is danger that the pupils will not study. The discussion method can get along without previous preparation on their part. Each can look up his facts in the text-book as the lesson proceeds, or catch them from the answers of someone else. But the result is that the pupils make no real contribution to the discussion, and lack the basis of knowledge which they need to comprehend its more vital truths. The discussion is bound to degenerate.

(3) *There is danger of wandering from the point—*this even if the pupils do study. Answers that are not quite right will throw you off the track; questions will be raised about remote and minor issues; or some suggestive remark will entice you to spend too much time in its development. It is hard to keep perspective. Everything seems important at the time. In teaching a class, as in writing a book, the biggest problem is to know what to keep out. You must have a plan well thought out before. You will have to adapt it, of course, to the exigencies of the discussion. You may even have to leave it. But it will at least give you a sense of direction and proportion.

4. The best method is, therefore, a combination of recitation and discussion. We may call it THE CO-OPERATIVE METHOD, for it alone deserves the name. No recitation is genuinely social unless the results of previous study are used in live discussion. No discussion is really co-operative unless the pupil is prepared to do his part; and this is best insured by definite assignment.

The essential characteristics of this method are implied in what we have said concerning recitation and discussion. We may sum them up briefly:

(1) The teacher keeps a week ahead of the class. He studies not only the lesson for the coming Sunday, but the lesson which he is then to assign for the next. He blocks out carefully the course which its discussion is to take, and from time to time finds definite pieces of work for individual pupils.

(2) After the main teaching period, he devotes about five minutes to the assignment for the next Sunday. It is a task that demands his best efforts. The way that he uses these minutes determines the way in which the pupils will study throughout the week. The teaching of the lesson begins right here. This is the introduction. It must tell enough of what is coming to make the pupil want to know more, and to set him to work intelligently. Simply to say, "Next Sunday we will study about so-and-so," is no assignment at all.

(3) On the next Sunday he develops the lesson by a discussion, in the course of which each pupil gets called upon, in one way or another, for the results of his work. The union of recitation and discussion is organic, not mechanical. The pupils' reports are made a vital part of the development of the lesson.

(4) The method may be adapted to the development of the pupils by changing the character of the assignments. In the lower grades only bits of memory work may be assigned for home study; then definite questions whose answers are to be written out, and manual work to be done. In higher grades, questions will be assigned for oral, rather than written answer; then topics may gradually be substituted for questions. The topical method of assignment finally may be adapted to the maturity of any class, by broadening the topics and making them demand more research.

5. In THE LECTURE METHOD the teacher does all the talking. Its virtues are (1) its definite and systematic presentation of the lesson; (2) its economy of time; (3) its attractiveness to many busy men and women who do not have the time or, more often, the inclination to study a lesson for themselves. Its weakness is, of course, the fact that the teacher does all the work and there is little or no study by the pupil. It is an excellent method with advanced classes, if you cannot get them to work in a better way. It demands the very best of teachers, and one who is a direct and resourceful public speaker. Such a teacher may attract large numbers of men and women to the Sunday school who would not enter any other class.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

Decide on your method for teaching the lesson which you chose for last week's paper. Give the reasons why you decide upon this method, in view of the character of the material on the one hand and the characteristics of the class on the other. If your method involves home study, state plainly just what you will expect your pupils to do; if it involves individual assignments, state what they are.

LESSON III

THE PLAN OF THE LESSON

I. FIVE FORMAL STEPS are involved in every well-taught lesson; so held Herbart, to whom modern pedagogy owes so much. These steps are:

(1) Preparation. The lesson begins by getting the pupil ready for the truth which he is to learn. The teacher calls up in his mind whatever he may already know about it or related matters, that he may feel a need of further knowledge, and that those ideas may be uppermost which will enable him rightly to comprehend and assimilate it.

(2) Presentation. Then comes the presentation of the lesson material. The teacher imparts the particular facts from which the new truth is to be learned.

(3) Association. This is the working over of the lesson material. The facts presented are compared with one another, and points of likeness and difference are made clear. The teacher inquires into their relations, and the pupil is made to see the common factor that runs through them all, or the links of time and place, cause and effect, reason and consequence, that bind them into a coherent whole.

(4) Generalization. The new truth embodied in the facts is formulated in a definite and compact statement. The conclusion is drawn.

(5) Application. Finally, the truth is used. The pupil is set to apply the principle or definition or rule which he formulated in the fourth step to new situations.

We have come to see that these steps are not as essential to every lesson as Herbart thought. They are the natural steps of an inductive lesson—one wherein the pupil is led to infer a general truth from a number of particular instances—and not all lessons are inductive. Yet the spirit of this lesson plan may well possess us. It is in a sense true that we must, in connection with each lesson, prepare the pupil's mind for the truth, present it clearly, think out its parts and relations, formulate it and apply it. And in the teacher's own thinking and planning every lesson should have at least three parts: preparation, presentation and conclusion.

2. PREPARATION. A great deal depends upon the way that you begin a lesson. And it is no easy task to begin rightly. There must be more than an introduction; there must be a real preparation for what is to follow. The aim of this first part is threefold: (1) to bring up within the pupil's mind such experiences and ideas of his own as may best help him to understand the truth to be taught; (2) to arouse his interest and give him a motive to seek further knowledge; (3) to set a definite subject for the work of the day.

(1) You must begin with the pupil's own ideas. This follows from the principle of apperception. The pupil will understand the lesson in terms drawn from his own experience. You cannot help that. It is the only way that he can understand at all. It is your business, then, to call up within his mind such items of his previous knowledge as may enable him rightly to comprehend it.

It does not matter where these ideas may have come from, provided they are his own and are really to the point. You may revive his memories of former lessons, or call up things he has read, or remind him of concrete experiences that he has had. In any case the one great question is—Is this idea one that will really help him to understand the lesson as he ought to understand it?

(2) You should arouse the pupil's interest. You must make him want to know the truth you are going to teach. The preparation "should show the need of the new material from the pupil's standpoint." *

In other words, you must make your pupil feel that there is something that he does not know or understand as fully as he ought; and you must make him want that something. By tactful remark or pointed question you will reveal to him the incompleteness of his present ideas. You will awaken within him a sense of need. You will make him conscious of a gap in his knowledge, and get him to feel that it is worth filling up.

This is what Du Bois has so finely called "finding the point of contact." The preparation must succeed in bringing together the pupil's interest on the one hand and the point of the lesson on the other. It fails if it deals with either alone. There are introductions which work up logically enough to the truth of the lesson, but do not direct toward it the pupil's active interest; just as there are others which awaken interest, but in something else than the lesson point. If the pupils are interested enough in what they have been learning and the lessons have historical or logical continuity, the ideal preparation may be a brief review. But more often you must set out from some concrete experience. And there are times, be it admitted, when all rules fail, and you will be driven to use any avenue of approach that will get the attention and interest of the class.

(3) You should set a definite subject for the lesson. It should be brief and attractive, and, if possible, worth remembering. But, above all, it should fit your pupils. The subject which you announce is your answer to their awakened interest and desire. Having made them conscious of a want, you now promise them its satisfaction. Having raised a question or shaped a problem, you definitely state the business of the hour to be the settling of that question, the solution of the problem.

The method of the preparation, with reference to its first two aims, should be that of questions and answers. It must enlist the pupil's activity, bring out his ideas and arouse his interest. Sometimes a good story may come in well; but it should not be used alone or with mere comment by the teacher. The subject should be stated, of course, by the teacher.

The whole part should be brief and to the point. Many teachers take entirely too long. They dull the edge of the pupil's interest before they reach the presentation. It is always easy to wander from the point when questions are asked; and especially easy when the pupils do not know what the questions are leading up to, as is the case here.

If your general method of conducting the class involves home study on the part of the pupils, or the giving of assignments of any sort, the step of preparation should be in large part gone through with at the time of making the lesson assignment—on the Sunday preceding its discussion. It must supply the motive for study.

3. PRESENTATION. The presentation of new material and the discussion of the relations involved, constitutes the body of the lesson. In general, it should occupy at least two-thirds of the time. Many aspects of presentation are treated in greater or less detail in other chapters. We here note simply:

(1) The presentation varies, of course, with the general methods of conducting the class discussed in the last chapter. In case of any method involving home study by the pupils, a part of the presentation comes from the text-book and from their use of the Bible. Each pupil may have his share, then, in the class presentation.

(2) Present the essential facts first. Go over the whole lesson quickly, touching on the big things. Get the facts clearly and in perspective. It is to this that the term "presentation" is limited in Herbart's scheme of five steps.

(3) You are then ready for the discussion—working over the facts, inquiring into their relations and implications, clearing up obscure points, hearing reports from pupils, organizing their results, and all the time working steadily toward a fuller comprehension of the main point. This is "association" in Herbart's scheme.

(4) You will use whatever illustrative material you need to hold the pupil's interest and to help him understand—object-teaching, manual work, correlation with previous lessons or with the work of the public schools, stories, pictures, blackboard, stereoscope, and the like. We shall discuss these in succeeding chapters.

4. CONCLUSION. Intellectually, the conclusion is the final step in the organization of the lesson material; practically, it brings home an obligation.

(1) The discussion should end with a definite summing up of results. The pupil should be led to look back over the lesson and to formulate its essential point in a compact statement. It should be an answer to the question with which you began your own study: "Just what did the writer himself mean to say?" If your teaching has succeeded, the pupil's conclusion will be his statement, in his own way, of the same thought that you chose as the aim of the lesson.

(2) When the lesson is one of a series, the conclusion should formulate its bearing upon what went before and what is to come. The point of the lesson may be in itself comparatively unimportant, yet essential to the development of a greater truth. It may be that the only good of a certain lesson is to supply a link of historical connection; yet if it really succeeds in helping to make that history clear and coherent, its service is as real as that of one which deals directly with some great spiritual insight.

(3) These two elements of the conclusion are intellectual; they deal with the organization of ideas. But our aim is practical as well. The appeal of God's truth is to conscience and will.

Sometimes the practical conclusion should be definitely and explicitly stated; sometimes not. To know when is one of the teacher's most serious problems. There is need here of tact and good sense as well as of consecration. We shall take up this problem in a later chapter. The practical aim of our work dare never be forgotten; it is a question simply of method.

(4) The pupil should make the conclusion for himself. It should be his own. It so means more, both to you and to him, than if you present a conclusion for his acceptance. Of course, you will often have to correct a wrong impression and help to reconstruct a poor statement; but the right of summing up results belongs to the pupil. Indeed, he only can sum up the real results, for they are within him.

5. Finally, we must remember that no plan is sacred. OUR PLANS MUST BE ADAPTABLE. They must fit the material. You will not teach history in the same way as poetry or even as biography; neither will you present the soul-stirring sermons of the prophets as you would the worldly wisdom of a collection of proverbs. You cannot apply the same plan to letters such as those of Paul and to a dramatic dialogue like the book of Job. They must fit the pupil. What may be an excellent form for a Junior lesson would fall flat with Senior pupils. They must be fitted to the exigencies of the occasion. The discussion will take many an unexpected turn. Some of these will reveal real needs.

No class can have life that is held too rigidly to a pre-arranged scheme.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

Write out in detail your plan for teaching the lesson which you chose for your first paper, and for which you decided upon a method in your last paper. Let your written plan include at least the following:

- (1) Questions which you will use in the step of preparation.
- (2) What is the need or problem to which you will seek to awaken the pupil's mind?
- (3) What subject will you set for this lesson?
- (4) What essential facts will you present or bring out in the recitation?
- (5) What points will you seek to develop in discussion?
- (6) What conclusion will you aim at?

ENLISTING THE PUPIL'S ACTIVITY

The true class, we have seen, is co-operative. The teacher will not do all the work. He should enlist the activity of the pupil.

I. THREE PRINCIPLES OF ACTIVITY are of great importance to the teacher :

(1) There is no learning without mental activity on the part of the pupil. This is the principle of self-activity, already familiar. You cannot think for your pupil. He must make his own ideas. The point we need here to emphasize is that learning requires mental activity. The pupil must think, not simply do. A class may be very active, yet learn little. They may answer every question—looking it up in their lesson leaves—and at the end know nothing. They may make beautiful maps and portfolios, even write out careful and correct answers in the blank spaces after the questions in their text-books; yet do it all so unthinkingly that they fail to lay hold of the truth. You must arouse the mind, not simply mouth and hands.

(2) To insure definite mental activity, the pupil must in some way express its results. This is one meaning of the oft-quoted pedagogical maxim, "No impression without expression." To make sure that the pupil gets the truth, you should have him express it. "We learn by doing." We never really know a thing until we give it to someone else in language or in action.

The pupil's expression of what he has learned is thus much more than a mere test. It is not simply for sake of letting you know what he has gotten and what he has failed to get. The expression is itself a means of impression. It helps him to learn. It moves his mind to act. It gives him a motive to think. It impels him to clear up his ideas and to make thoughts definite which might otherwise remain vague and formless. It is a revelation to himself of what he really does know.

(3) There is no expression without a social motive. It is to other persons that we tell things, and for others or for recognition by them that we do what we do. Without them we should have no motive to express what is within us. We do not speak just for sake of speaking, or write merely for the pleasure of feeling a thought form itself at our finger-tips; we speak to somebody, and write for some reason. So with a pupil. Bid him simply to tell what he knows, and you will dry up the springs of thought and speech within him. He has no vital motive. But arrange a social situation such that he may tell it to somebody and for some reason, and he will express himself in a natural and spontaneous way. Public school teachers have found that the girl whose compositions are formal and stilted may yet write a simple and natural letter to a girl in another town; that the boy who cannot write an essay worth looking at may hand in an excellent article for the school paper, that a pupil who seems tongue-tied when called on to recite, may be able to tell to another pupil the very thing he could not in class find words for. It is your business, as teacher, not merely to demand expression from your pupil, but to furnish motives and material, to provide social situations such as naturally call it forth.

2. IN THE BEGINNERS' DEPARTMENT WE MUST PROVIDE FOR AND USE THE CHILD'S PHYSICAL ACTIVITY AND PLAY. The department should have a separate room, if possible; if not, it should be screened off from the rest of the school. It should have little chairs that can be arranged in a circle about the teacher. The program of the hour should be informal, the instruction periods short. Better have two short periods than one longer one, and a time between for rest, change of position and physical activity.

The use of physical activity and play in the Sunday school can be objected to only by those who do not understand children. It does not mean that the department is to be in constant turmoil, each pupil doing what he pleases and moving about where he will, while the teacher distractedly tries to keep all busy. It does not mean that the atmosphere of reverence and worship is lost. It means rather that the teacher recognizes that there is sure to be physical activity, for children are so made; and plans to use and direct it and so confine it within proper bounds, instead of trying to repress it and only succeeding in spreading it over the whole hour in form of mischievous interruption.

Marches, drills and motion songs and plays have both a recreative and an educational value for children of this age. They may be used to illustrate and impress the truth of the lesson, as well as to engage active hands and feet and little bodies full of play. And it is often wise to use them just for rest and recreation. After five minutes of such bodily activity, with fresh air, the children are ready in perfect quiet to give eager attention to the lesson story. Care must be taken, of course, not to lose the quiet spirit of the hour. Jig-time music and violent exercises are out of place. There is no need, moreover, of a physical material for play, such as the kindergarten gifts.

The little child's play, we have seen, is imaginative and dramatic. You need nothing more than simple little plays that enlist at once the body and the imagination. Let the children represent trees or birds or flowers, snow or rain, and go through appropriate motions to the accompaniment of piano or song. A little child's play instinct is easily met.

It demands nothing elaborate or boisterous. The one requirement is that you satisfy the imagination. You must enter with him into the land of make-believe.

3. IN THE PRIMARY DEPARTMENT, THE ACTIVITY OF THE PUPIL CENTERS ABOUT HIS REPRODUCTION OF THE STORY. Of this we shall think in the chapter on "Story-Telling and Story-Reproduction."

4. WE SHALL ENLIST THE ACTIVITY OF JUNIOR PUPILS BY HANDWORK. The term "handwork" has been applied rather loosely in discussions of Sunday school methods. We shall understand by it the construction by the pupil of some object or record which shall express the results of his study in a more or less permanent way. There are as many sorts of handwork as there are possible things for a pupil to make in connection with the Sunday school lessons. We may sum up the more important occupations in five great classes:

(1) Picture work. Drawing pictures illustrative of the lessons, or coloring pictures with water-color or crayon; collecting pictures from various sources, especially those of the great masters, as reproduced in the many excellent series now so cheaply available; cutting pictures out and pasting them in a portfolio or note-book, either as a simple collection or as illustrations for a written text.

(2) Map work. Coloring outline maps; locating places; tracing journeys; drawing maps; modeling relief maps in sand, clay or pulp; drawing plans of cities and diagrams of buildings; constructing a series of maps to show historical and political changes, and the like. There is room here for a great variety of work, and it can be made of absorbing interest.

(3) Written work. Text-books filled out, portfolios constructed, or note-books written up. They may contain written answers to questions, copies of verses, outlines and charts; stories and narratives; a life of Jesus or Paul, or a record of their travels; a brief history of the period studied; a harmony of the gospels; collections of Bible poems or speeches, and the like. The book should be illustrated with pictures and maps, drawn by the pupil himself or pasted in; and when finished it should be neatly and permanently bound, to serve as a record of the year's work. Such books, of course, may be of all degrees of elaborateness.

(4) Object work. The construction of objects to illustrate the lessons, such as models of the tabernacle or temple, miniature tents, houses, carts, furniture, weapons, etc. The girls will enjoy making clothes such as were worn in Bible times and dressing dolls in them; the boys may make figures of clay or pulp to represent characters and scenes.

(5) Museum work. The collection of articles to illustrate the lessons, to be given by the class to the school and made part of a permanent museum, available for use by future classes. They may secure relics of Bible times or articles from the Palestine of to-day—such as coins, garments, weapons, stones, grain, flowers. Of especial usefulness will be such additions as they can make to the school's collection of pictures, lantern slides or views for the stereoscope.

These manual methods are very flexible. You should adapt the work to your own particular situation. You should put to yourself at least three questions:

(a) What sort of handwork shall we try to do, and how much? Such work, and only so much, as is needed to engage the pupil's interest and co-operation. The handwork is not an end in itself; it is but a means to a higher end. The Sunday school does not exist for sake of manual training; its aim is spiritual. Handwork is of value in just so far as it helps the pupil to get the truth he needs; it becomes a hindrance if it keeps him from lifting his soul above mere things.

(b) Shall the handwork be done in the class or at home? Wherever, by actual experience, you find that you can get the best results. It is hard to get pupils to do the work at home with any regularity. They are busy with public school work and there are too many distractions. On the other hand, the lesson period on Sunday is too short for anything more than the discussion of the lesson. If you do the work in class, you must have a longer period, seat the children about a table and work with them, not for them. It is best, but not necessary, to have a separate class-room. There is, of course, a third possibility, which may be combined with either of the other two. The class will be glad now and then to meet on a weekday evening for sewing or modeling, or some other particularly interesting piece of work.

(c) Shall the handwork be done before or after the presentation of the lesson? It depends upon the maturity of the pupils. Younger children, to whom the lesson must be presented in story-form, will do the work best after the story has been told. Older children will take more interest in doing work that looks forward to a coming class discussion than in work that reviews the discussion of the previous Sunday. They want to find out things for themselves. If we follow the story method, then the first instruction period will be for review and for handwork or reports upon handwork done at home; the second will be given to the new story. If we follow other methods, the first period will be given to discussion of the lesson for the day, using the results of home study and handwork, or actually doing the work; the second, generally shorter, will be devoted to assignment and preparation for the lesson of the coming week.

5. IN THE JUNIOR AND HIGHER DEPARTMENTS THE PUPIL SHOULD WORK AT ASSIGNED STUDY. We have already thought of the teacher's problem—how to get the pupil to study. We shall here remind ourselves of three counsels then brought out:

(1) Now and then assign a specific bit of study to each pupil and hold him responsible for it. It will generally lead him to study the whole lesson.

(2) Suit the assignments to the maturity of the class. Beginning with bits of memory work or handwork, the method should aim to make pupils able to study a given topic intelligently and to report upon it concisely.

(3) Show your pupils how to study. Take a class period now and then to study with them, instead of the usual discussion; and teach them how to go at their lessons. Watch your opportunity for a talk with each pupil individually, and work with him some week in the preparation of his topic, to show him how you would do it. Most of all, begin as early as you can to use the reference library, and develop within your pupils the ability to handle its books for themselves. Show them how to use Hastings' Bible Dictionary, the concordance, atlas, histories and books of travel and exploration.

Many an adolescent loses interest in the work of the Sunday school because it seems so pinched intellectually. His lesson leaf presents such a meager lot of material, he thinks, and that all digested for him. You can do such a boy no greater service than to bring him into contact with the work of the great Bible scholars. Give him references to real books instead of text-books—to Ramsey, Edersheim, Thompson, George Adam Smith, Schürer. He may be repelled because he finds them too hard, but he will at least have acquired a new respect for the text-book that brings him the results of such work. Best of all, he may refuse to be daunted by something hard, and acquire a permanent interest in the problems of Biblical interpretation.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

Write upon one of the following topics:

1. Your observation of or experience with the uses of play in the lower departments of the Sunday school.
2. Your observation of or experience with hand-work in the Sunday school.
3. Your observation of or experience with the problem of getting pupils to study their lessons; and your constructive plan for solving this problem.

LESSON V

GETTING AND HOLDING ATTENTION

To secure and hold the pupil's attention is the teacher's first and most fundamental problem. To attempt to teach without attention is useless. The pupil is present in body but not in mind. It is even harmful, for it results in wrong impressions and inattentive habits.

I. THE NATURE OF ATTENTION. Attention is but another name for definite, clean-cut mental activity. Whatever we are clearly conscious of we are at that moment paying attention to. It may best be described by a figure of speech. Just as the field of a camera has a focus where the picture is clear and distinct and things upon its margin appear more or less blurred and vaguely outlined in proportion to their distance from the focus, so the field of consciousness has a focus and a margin. The activity of the mind always centers about some one thing or group of things, some single idea or thought. This is the object of attention. Something else may take its place in the fraction of a second, for the mind moves quickly; but for the moment it stands at the focus and other things are upon the margin. It is clearly and distinctly apprehended; they are more or less dim and blurred.

We are always paying attention to something or other. Attention is a constant characteristic of the mind's action. Every moment of consciousness has its focus. The inattentive pupil is inattentive not because he is mentally inert, but because his mind is wandering. He is really paying attention, but to something else than the lesson. The teacher's problem is not so much to create attention within him as successfully to compete with the more attractive something else.

2. THERE ARE TWO KINDS OF ATTENTION—VOLUNTARY AND SPONTANEOUS. Attention is voluntary when directed by an act of will. It requires effort. One is more or less conscious of a split of impulses. He feels the attraction of other things but resists them and holds his mind to the chosen object. Attention is spontaneous when it is given to some object naturally and without effort. There is no inward conflict; one is whole-minded. Activity is in the direction of interest.

The spontaneous attention of the pupil is worth more to the teacher than his voluntary attention. Under its direction he is more apt to do thorough work. For the time, he identifies himself with his task. His study is whole-hearted. Since he needs spend no effort upon himself to hold steady his vagrant wits, he puts all the more strength into the work of the hour.

Voluntary attention, on the other hand, is an unstable state. It cannot long be sustained without lapsing into spontaneous attention of some sort. Either the mind wanders from the topic set and must be pulled back to work; or one gets interested in the task that was begun by effort, and further attention to it becomes spontaneous.

3. THE TEACHER SHOULD AIM, THEREFORE, SO TO TEACH THAT THE SUBJECT ITSELF WILL NATURALLY ENGAGE THE INTEREST AND CLAIM THE ATTENTION OF THE PUPIL. There are other ways, of course, of getting attention. You may demand it or coax for it, scare it into pupils or cajole it out of them, bribe them with rewards or appeal to their respect for yourself. But attention so gotten is unstable and of little worth. It cannot be long sustained; and while it does last, has no apperceptive value. These are but external means. They bear no relation to the truth you teach. You should arouse the pupil's interest in the subject itself, not merely in pleasing you, getting rewards or avoiding punishments. You ought so to teach that the truth may make its own appeal.

4. But this only brings us to the real problem of every teacher. Granted that we must get attention, and the kind of attention that springs from interest, THE GREAT QUESTION IS—How? It is no easy thing to hold the interest of a class. And it is not a problem that can be solved once for all. You face it anew each Sunday.

(1) First of all, remove the distractions. Begin your effort to hold the attention and interest of your class by eliminating all those things that would be apt to get it away from you. You are in fact a competitor for the attention of your pupil. It is not the total lack of attention that your teaching must combat, so much as his proneness to pay attention to something else that is for the moment more interesting.

This is why, ideally, each class should have a room of its own. It is hard to hold the interest and attention of a class if there are other classes all about it in the same room, each with its own buzz of discussion, and some with the inevitable loud-mouthed teacher who mistakes intensity of sound for forcefulness. The room should be furnished simply and comfortably, and for the use of the class. It should contain nothing in the way of furniture, pictures or paraphernalia that is not in line with the work you expect to do. This does not mean that it is to be bare and unattractive. Pictures, books, maps, tables for manual work, have their rightful place. It is the home and work-room of the class; and it should be both homelike and usable. But the teacher will rigidly exclude anything that has no connection with the work of the class and might distract the pupil's attention.

The teacher will see to it that the physical conditions of the class-room are favorable. The seats should be comfortable, the heat right, the air kept fresh. No one can give attention when fatigued or dulled by bad air. We must be at our best physically to do good mental work.

A great deal depends upon the way the class is seated. One rule is absolute and invariable—the teacher ought to be able to see every pupil. Seat your class so that you can. Put them in a circle about you if you cannot see them all in any other way. Stand while you teach, if you cannot see all from your chair. However you do it, see them. Know everything that is going on. Read their faces. Learn from the expression who is paying attention and who is not, who has understood your teaching and who has failed to grasp it.

The teacher's own personality may be a distraction. Anything that calls attention to yourself takes it away from the subject. Be natural. Avoid affectations and peculiarities.

The teacher may introduce distractions in the course of the teaching itself. To reprimand a pupil or to call for the attention of one whose mind you see to be wandering, is simply to make matters worse. You distract the class as a whole; and instead of one pupil not thinking of the lesson, you now have ten or twenty to win back. Teachers who use objects to illustrate the lesson must be especially careful. Do not bring out your objects too soon. They only distract attention if seen before they are actually used. And do not use them at all unless you are sure that they will work in just the way you plan. Stories and illustrations are to be avoided, too, that do not clearly illustrate or that are suggestive of other trains of thought than that of the lesson itself.

The administrative department of the Sunday school ought in no way interrupt the teaching. The officers of a school may greatly hinder the effectiveness of its work, if they go about their duties in such a way as to attract the attention of pupils. The teaching period should be kept for teaching alone.

(2) Know your lesson thoroughly. It is not enough to remove distractions; you must make your teaching a positive attraction. You must fill the hour with interest. You must teach with power. And there is only one way to attain power in teaching. It is to begin at the very foundation—by first learning the truth you are to teach. To know his subject and to know it thoroughly is the primary qualification of a teacher.

This means that you ought to make a definite and careful study of each lesson. The teacher who relies upon his general knowledge, or upon his familiarity with a round of lessons that he has taught before, is bound to lose the interest of his pupils. The teacher who no longer feels the need of a special preparation of each lesson might as well give up his class.

But it also means that you ought not be content with a mere getting together of the particular points you wish to discuss with the class. A teacher needs to know a great deal more than he ever attempts to give to his pupils, for sake both of perspective and interest. Professor Palmer has well expressed this need in his characterization of the ideal teacher. He is speaking primarily of his own experience as a college professor; but his words apply as well to teachers of every sort:

"In preparing a lecture I find I always have to work hardest on the things I do not say. The things I am sure to say I can easily get up. They are obvious and generally accessible. But they, I find, are not enough. I must have a broad background of knowledge which does not appear in speech. I have to go over my entire subject and see how the things I am to say look in their various relations, tracing out connections which I shall not present to my class. One might ask what is the use of this? Why prepare more matter than can be used? Every successful teacher knows. I cannot teach right up to the edge of my knowledge without a fear of falling off. My pupils discover this fear, and my words are ineffective. They feel the influence of what I do not say. One cannot precisely explain it; but when I move freely across my subject as if it mattered little on what part of it I rest, they get a sense of assured power which is compulsive and fructifying. The subject acquires consequence, their minds swell, and they are eager to enter regions of which they had not previously thought. . . . Even to teach a small thing well we must be large."*

(3) Be yourself interested in the lesson. You can teach nothing well that you have not made a real part of yourself. You can rouse no interest in that for which you do not yourself care.

(4) Find the "point of contact." Know your pupils. Understand their experience and get into sympathetic touch with their interests. Look at the truth through their eyes. Present the lesson in terms drawn from their life, and adapt it to the needs they feel. It is not enough simply to keep a class interested. Any entertainer could do that. You must get them interested in the right thing. You must bring into contact the point of the lesson on the one hand and their wants and needs on the other.

(5) Keep alive. Keep the discussion moving, and get somewhere. Avoid the dead monotony of a set routine. Adapt yourself to the exigencies of the moment, and grasp its opportunities.

Be alive to the attitudes of your pupils. Read their faces and postures. Know who is giving attention and whose mind is wandering, who is understanding and who is not; then fit your teaching to the conditions you face.

* Palmer: "The Teacher," p. 17.

Be alive to the ideas of your pupils. Get them to think for themselves and to express what they think. Then respect their thoughts. Take pains to understand and use them. There will be many misconceptions and blundering statements, of course. But those very misconceptions are the material upon which you must work. You will take them at their face value, as expressions of the pupil's real understanding of the matter in hand and his honest attempt to contribute to the discussion. You will lead him to see where they are wrong, and so to revise and correct them. A mistaken statement, expressing the pupil's own thought, is worth much more to you than a perfectly correct one which is only an echo of what you have told him or he has read in a book. It is your business not to put ready-made ideas in at the pupil's ears and then pull them out again at his mouth, but to help him to construct right ideas of his own. No class can have life and interest where the teacher's ideas are the only ones expressed or ultimately used. There must be a real exchange of thought. The best teacher is he who can most skillfully use the pupil's own ideas.

5. THE TEACHER SHOULD APPEAL TO THAT INTEREST WHOSE APPERCEPTIVE VALUE IS HIGHEST. Interesting a pupil and getting him to understand the lesson should be one and the same thing. The interest to which the teacher appeals should be such as may help the pupil to grasp the truth and develop a right permanent attitude toward it. If a boy learns a Bible verse because he will get a "ticket" for it, ultimately redeemable in a prize, his interest neither helps him to understand the verse nor begets within him an attitude toward the Bible that is permanently desirable. If the teacher tells a funny story or two "to get the class interested," and then plunges into a lesson discussion to which they apply but remotely, the class will remember the stories but not the teaching. In both these cases the interest appealed to is external. It bears no real relation to the content of the lesson. The teacher seems to assume that the arousal of interest and the presentation of the lesson are separate problems.

But we fail unless we get the pupil interested in the lesson itself. And that means that we must translate the whole lesson material into terms of the pupil's own experience, that answer to his instincts and felt needs. Our problem is not to make a lesson interesting by tricks of method or by adding to it stories or other material pleasant but extraneous; it is to bring out of each lesson its intrinsic interest.

There are times of extremity, of course, when the teacher has no choice. He is driven to appeal to any interest, however remote, that will give him access to the mind of the pupil. Such extremity may result from his own failure to bring out the essential interest of the lesson. Usually, however, it comes simply from the lack of that personal confidence and respect of the class for the teacher that underlies all effective teaching. The teacher just beginning work with an unruly gang of boys or with a self-satisfied, giggling bevy of girls, must win them first in any way he can. He may have to begin with something utterly foreign to the truth he means ultimately to bring out. The "point of contact" he first seeks is that between his pupils and himself; only later can he seek to make contact between their needs and a lesson point.

Write on one of the following topics:

1. Diagnose some case of inattention, tracing out the conditions which caused it, as far as you can.
2. Describe some case in which the teacher appealed to an interest of low apperceptive value, showing the higher interest to which appeal might have been made.
3. Examine the teaching conditions in your own class, with a view to their bearing upon the problem of attention.

LESSON VI

PRINCIPLES OF ILLUSTRATION

There is no better way to bring the truth home to the minds and hearts of those we teach than by effective illustration. The teacher needs the gift of imagination. He must be able to see the truth concretely, and quick to conceive its analogies.

I. There are certain GENERAL PRINCIPLES which apply to all illustrations, whether verbal only or objective as well:

(1) The illustration should be more familiar than the truth it is meant to illustrate. It should be simple and concrete, dealing with matters that lie well within the range of the pupil's own experience. Its aim is to cast the light of the known upon the unknown. If it, too, deals with what is unknown, we simply double difficulties. Jesus always drew His illustrations from the common experiences of everyday life. It is one of the things that made Him the ideal Teacher.

We need to remember this principle even with respect to those illustrations which are recorded in the Bible itself. They reflect the life of Bible times and Bible lands. And because our life is different, we may not understand them. Missionaries have learned that they must put the truth in terms of the life of the people they address, even though it may compel a very free paraphrasing of the Scripture story.

"One Sunday, in Ceylon, I was addressing, through an interpreter, a large congregation of native Christians, and unfortunately chose the subject of the good shepherd. My interpreter told me afterward that not one of my hearers had ever seen a sheep, or knew what it was. 'How, then, did you explain what I said?' I asked. 'Oh!' he replied, 'I turned it into a buffalo that had lost its calf, and went into the jungle to find it.' " *

We must remember, moreover, that an illustration perfectly familiar and simple to ourselves may not be such to our pupils. It is from their standpoint that its effectiveness is to be judged. "I once heard a preacher explain hope to a number of children thus: 'Now, I will explain hope, so all these little girls can go home and tell their mothers what hope is. Now, children, you know that this beautiful stream of water that runs behind this meeting house is composed of two elements, oxygen and hydrogen; so hope is composed of desire and expectation.' And on he went." †

This preacher gives an excellent example of what not to do. He not only uses a poor illustration; he tries to make up for its lack of simplicity by a sort of playful intimacy of manner and irrelevant remark. But the only true way to get simplicity is to make the lesson material itself simple; to find something in the child's own experience to which it may be likened, and so to develop the new on the basis of the old and familiar.

(2) Illustrations should be natural, spontaneous and to the point. Stories that impress one as being lugged in to keep things lively, figures that are strained and artificial, have no place. Illustration is not an end in itself, neither is it for sake of ornament. It is to help the pupil understand. If a particular illustration does not really help, or is not needed, better cut it out.

(3) It is a mistake to use too many illustrations. Just enough to make the point clear and impress it strongly—is the rule. And one illustration to a single point, if it be well chosen, is generally enough. If more be used, they are apt to confuse. On the other hand, care must be taken not to use the same illustration always for a given point, lest the pupil's conception of the truth be narrowed and distorted by constant association with one particular instance.

* Canon Tristram, quoted by Du Bois: "The Point of Contact in Teaching," p. 91.

† "The Sunday School Teacher's Pedagogy," p. 106.

(4) The illustration should not be incongruous. It should not be more unlike than like the truth it is meant to picture. I once heard an evangelist speak of the “knock-out blow” that Christ gave to the church at Ephesus when He wrote to them through John: “Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love.” And he was not content to leave it a metaphor; he made it a story, and launched into a vivid description of a certain disgusting prize-fight which had taken place a few months before, picturing how all that the beaten fighter had done through round after round was of no avail against that one blow that finally knocked him out.

(5) The illustration should not be too suggestive. It is but a window through which the truth is to shine. If it attracts attention to itself, it distracts the mind and clouds the vision. Some illustrations are too vivid and interesting. They start new and inviting trains of thought, and the pupil is soon far from the lesson.

2. PICTURES have a threefold value as illustrative material:

(a) Sense value. Appealing to the eye as well as to the ear, the teacher is better able to get the attention and hold the interest of the pupil.

(b) Fact value. Seeing gives more definite knowledge than hearing. Pictures help to make Bible scenes real, and give material to the imagination. The pupil's ideas become more concrete and definite, his mental pictures clearer.

(c) Ideal value. The pictures of a great artist do more than represent facts; they present ideals. They give insight into life's spiritual meanings, and uplift to higher levels of feeling. The Sistine Madonna is not a photograph of Jesus and His mother; but it is more. We do not know whether it reproduces the features of Mary; but it does what is of infinitely more moment—it reveals to us her spirit. It is the eternal spirit of motherhood, with all its love and joy in suffering, its beauty and dignity. It portrays an ideal universal to humanity.

The Sunday school has always used pictures; but it has at times relied too exclusively upon the first of these values. It has used such pictures as would appeal to the senses, without sufficient regard for their faithfulness to fact or for their artistic and ideal value. We have now come to see that children are just as ready to enjoy good pictures as poor ones, and that we need lose nothing of the appeal to the senses by striving as well for the fact and ideal values. It is now possible, moreover, to obtain copies of good pictures so cheaply that there is no excuse for compelling children to look at poor ones.

(1) The pictures of great artists are worth more than any other, for the reason that they combine all three values. Even a child sees more than faces when he looks at such pictures as Hofmann's "Christ in the Temple with the Doctors," "Christ and the Rich Young Man," and "Christ in Gethsemane." He is able to read the heart beneath. We owe it to our children to bring them into contact with the best pictures as well as with the best books, and to make them able to appreciate the spiritual values of art. No one has a better opportunity to do this than the Sunday school teacher; and few things that he can do will better quicken and develop the spiritual capacities of the pupil. It is significant how the world's greatest artists have turned to the Bible for their subjects. The life of Christ particularly is well portrayed by modern painters, whose conception of Him is in general better suited to our present ways of thinking than that of many of the old masters.

(2) Photographs of Palestine as it exists to-day, of its people and their occupations, help very much to make real to pupils the scenes and circumstances of the Bible story.

(3) Stereoscopic views are better yet. Shut off by the hood from the world of here and now, the boy who looks through a stereoscope seems really transported into Bible lands. The picture stands out in all the perspective of the third dimension, and its figures even seem life size.

(4) Any Sunday school that can afford it should have a stereopticon for use in reviews, illustrated lectures, and the like, before the whole school or before a single class at some special meeting. The possibilities of such illustration are now greatly increased by the use of reflectors which throw upon the screen a page of any book with its print, diagrams or pictures, just as clearly as the older lantern would a prepared slide. In this way the teacher may make available to the class a great amount of material which they would otherwise never get.

(5) Schools and colleges are just awaking to the possibilities of moving pictures as an educational instrument. The Sunday school, too, would do well to bring before its pupils now and then moving pictures of the Passion Play, of scenes in the Holy Land of to-day, of scenes illustrating missionary work in foreign lands, and the like. The craze for moving picture shows, which has in the past few years spread over the country, is but an indication of the interest which pupils are bound to feel in pictures which actually bring life before them.

3. OBJECTS as illustrative material have both a sense and a fact value. In dealing with young children especially, the appeal to the senses is needed to hold their attention and interest and to make the needed impression. For pupils of all ages, there is great value in objects or models that help to make more real the conditions about which the class is studying. Relics of ancient times or articles from the Palestine of to-day or from mission fields, help to give a definite knowledge that could be gotten in no other way.

(1) We must carefully distinguish, however, between those objects whose relation to the truth we teach is merely symbolic, and those whose relation is real. A Roman coin, an old Greek lamp, a model of the temple or of the agricultural implements or clothes of Bible times, a model house to show how Peter could go "up upon the housetop to pray" or how a sick man could be let down into a room from the roof—these have a real relation to the truth. From such objects we get both sense and fact values. But to use a crown to illustrate the "crown of life," a magnifying-glass to explain Mary's joy as expressed in the Magnificat, a paper pattern and scissors as a symbol of Christ our pattern, is to appeal to the senses merely, and to run grave risk of a misapprehension of the truth. There is always danger that children will not understand our figures of speech; and we more than double the danger when we present the figure in object form, because of the greater strength with which the object itself will enchain their interest and attention and tie their minds down to its literal presence and quality.

(2) If symbolic objects be used as illustrations—and there are, doubtless, times when it is well to use them, despite the danger involved—they should conform to the general principles of effective illustration noted earlier in this chapter. They should be natural, not forced; they should be more familiar than the truth to be illustrated; they should not be incongruous or too suggestive. Perhaps the most common of all "object lessons" is the use of chemicals by which a colorless liquid turns red when another is poured into it, and becomes clear as crystal again when a third is introduced—it all being supposed to illustrate the effect of sin upon the heart and its purification by the love of God. But such a procedure transgresses the most fundamental principle of teaching. The illustration is not more familiar than the truth to be illustrated. It attempts to explain the unknown by the unknown. It is very apt, moreover, to convey to children a wrong implication—that the operation of God's Spirit is as instantaneous and magical in its character as the change in the liquid appears to them.

(3) The use of symbolic objects takes time and compels a more or less definite centering of the whole lesson about them. Such an illustration is much less economical than one that is verbal. There is always the danger that the illustration may become an end in itself rather than a means.

(4) There is a danger that object teaching may degrade the interests of the children by holding them to a sense plane. Children who have been taught too exclusively by objects become incapable of appreciating anything else. They will always demand “something interesting,” else they will not give attention.

4. The BLACKBOARD is a very important help, which has been much misunderstood and misused. Its true use is free, living and personal. A rapid descriptive sketch, an outline map or diagram, an important word or principle written as well as spoken—such is true blackboard illustration, done as the teacher talks, reinforcing the impression of ear with that of eye. If possible, every class should have its own blackboard; for it is as a help in actual teaching that it is most needed—not merely for announcement, review or ornament.

Write on one of the following topics:

1. Plan in detail and describe the illustrative material, of any sort, which you will use in teaching the lesson which you dealt with in your first three papers.

2. Observe, describe and evaluate some object lesson.

3. Choose pictures to use in connection with the next month's lessons in your Sunday school class, and tell why you chose just these particular ones.

4. Classify the illustrative material Jesus used and give typical occasions of use.

LESSON VII

STORY-TELLING AND STORY-REPRODUCTION

Whether it deal with fact or fancy, a story is a work of the imagination. It makes the truth live. It makes us see the things it tells; it stirs our hearts to feel and our wills to act. "Of all the things that a teacher should know how to do," says President Hall, "the most important, without exception, is to be able to tell a story."

1. There are three chief WAYS IN WHICH WE MAY USE STORIES :

(1) As presentation. The lesson itself may be cast into story form. This is essential in the two lower departments; and there the telling of the story is the central work of the hour. In the higher departments, too, it is sometimes well to present the lesson as a story if it is full of dramatic action.

(2) As preparation. A story may be very effectively used to lead up to the lesson—some bit of everyday experience, perhaps, that will arouse interest in the subject to be presented; or a review of previous lessons in quick, vivid narration; or the tale of what happened between the events of the last lesson and those of this.

(3) As illustration. Jesus so used stories. He taught in concrete pictures that brought home the truth to the simplest mind. "Without a parable spake He not unto them."

2. HOW TO TELL A STORY. There are two standpoints from which we may judge a story. We may inquire, first, whether it is well told or worth telling, just as a story, to be enjoyed; second, whether it teaches anything or drives home a moral. As teachers, we think generally of the second of these standpoints, and it is our vice to neglect the first. But the truth is that the teaching value of a story depends upon its enjoyment value. If it is not worth telling just as a story, or if it is poorly told, it will not fulfill its purpose as a bit of teaching.

A good story is, as Miss Bryant reminds us, a work of art. It exists, primarily, to be enjoyed. We love to hear it not because we seek from it an ulterior benefit, but because it fires the imagination and moves the feelings. Like a beautiful landscape or a great picture, it just naturally appeals to us, we know not how or why.

The teaching value of a well-told story is thus indirect. The pupil gives himself up to its enjoyment. Like a bit of play, it relaxes the tension of the class-room. There is no effort needed to hold the attention; the story grips his interest, and he surrenders to it without reserve. It brings before him a mental picture, and stirs the heart within him. But at the end he has gotten more than a mere picture, and experienced what is deeper than an idle play of feeling—he has gained a concrete impression of the truth and has felt its power.

The teacher ought to do his best, therefore, to learn the story-teller's art. It is not wholly an inborn gift. It can be cultivated. Study carefully the books in the bibliography at the end of this chapter; then go to work to apply their suggestions in repeated practice. There is room here merely to summarize certain outstanding counsels:

(1) To tell a story well, one must prepare and practice it. There are times, of course, when the inspiration of the moment gives both vision and power of expression. But he who relies upon such inspiration will miserably fail. Here, as everywhere, the secret of success is work.

(2) To tell a story well, one must first possess it and make it a very part of himself. He must possess it in imagination. He must really see the thing he hopes to make others see. He must possess it logically—grasping its point, and holding its details in right relation. He must possess it in feeling—putting his heart into the situation he describes. It is worse than useless to tell a story that you do not yourself appreciate and enjoy, or to try to move others to a sympathy you do not feel.

(3) Reduce the story to its simplest terms. Find the main plot, and let everything else go. Eliminate rigidly all unnecessary details, irrelevant incidents and secondary characters. Then tell the story in direct and simple language, and in terms of action, rather than of description. "Tell what was done, not how somebody felt or thought when something was being done. . . . Those of us who have grown away from childhood tend to reverse the true order, to place the emphasis on the question, 'What kind of man was he,' and not on 'What did he do.' Let what he did tell what he was. Your story will thus have 'go,' as all Bible stories have." *

(4) Maintain logical unity and movement. Nothing spoils a story so utterly as a confusion of points of view, or the failure to get some point in at its rightful place, then backing up later to supply it. No story-teller ought ever be obliged to stop and say, "Oh! I forgot to tell you that—."

(5) Use direct discourse. When you tell what somebody said, use the first person instead of the third. Note the confusion and obscurity of the indirect form of telling the story of the good Samaritan: "And then when he left he gave the innkeeper some money, and told him to take care of him, and that if he spent any more for him, he would repay him."

(6) Put your whole self into the telling. This is the hard thing for most people. The difference between a good story-teller and a poor one is most often a difference of temperament. The first naturally and spontaneously expresses what he feels; the second is ashamed and afraid to let himself go. The one is naturally dramatic; the other diffident and reserved. To tell a story well, you must really act it out, in changes of voice inflection, in expression of eyes and feature, in quiet gesture. Anything more than this, however, is out of place, and but calls attention to the incongruity of the present situation with that which the teller is attempting too realistically to portray.

3. IN THE PRIMARY DEPARTMENT, THE ACTIVITY OF THE PUPIL CENTERS ABOUT HIS REPRODUCTION OF THE STORY. If the lesson story has been well told, nothing will give the children greater delight than to reproduce it for themselves. And nothing can be of more educational value. It is real self-expression, socially motivated. It makes the truth the child's own. There are three ways in which the children may reproduce the story:

(1) Telling it. "It is such fun to listen to a good story that children remember it without effort, and, later, when asked if they can tell it, they are as eager to try as if it were a personal experience which they were burning to impart. Each pupil is given a chance to try each story, at some time. Then that one which each has told especially well is allotted to him for his own particular story, on which he has an especial claim thereafter. It is surprising to note how individual and distinctive the expression of voice and manner becomes, after a short time. The child instinctively emphasizes the points which appeal to him, and the element of fun in it all helps bring forgetfulness of self." *

* Bryant: "How to Tell Stories to Children," p. 112.

This is an account of story-telling by children in the public schools, where the interest of the teacher was not primarily in the content of the story itself, but in the development of the child's power of expression. It applies as well to the work of the Sunday school teacher, who is interested in having the child lay hold of the truth of the story. Let not the word "fun" mislead us. The fun of story-telling is not amiss in the Sunday school. It is the joy of the creative imagination, the happiness of inwardly seeing and feeling what one tells and of putting one's whole self into the telling. It is the delight of making others see and feel, and sharing with them the truth that seems so real. What matter if the story is old, and the child tells it time after time in the same words, and often with the very inflections that the teacher first used? That, for children, only adds to the pleasure of the telling. They do not want different words. They like to recognize the old forms, and even to join in the refrain when certain striking phrases are reached. It is a blessed boon to the teacher—this natural love of repetition. It makes easy the permanent implanting of the truth.

(2) Drawing. Every child likes to draw, and every child should be allowed to. It is not that we hope to develop artists, but simply that drawing is a natural form of expression. The child who tries to tell a story in a picture must have a definite and clear mental picture. The story afterward is more vivid and real to his mental vision. He can tell it better in words just because he has tried to tell it in pictures.

The most convenient forms of drawing for the Sunday school are: (a) Drawing with pencil or black or colored crayons upon fairly large sheets of paper. (b) Drawing upon the blackboard. Children like this, for its novelty and for the prominence it gives to the one chosen to draw a picture for the class. It also permits co-operative drawing—one child making part of a picture and others completing it—which engages the hearty interest of the whole class if you do not have it too often. (c) Cutting out silhouettes from paper. Children take a great deal of pleasure in this, and produce far better illustrations than one would at first think.

The drawings will be very crude, but that does not matter. You are not teaching drawing but Bible stories. Do not waste time trying to get a perfect picture. It is but a means by which the child may express his own ideas and get the benefit that comes from such expression. Of course, in so far as the drawing reveals a misconception of the story, you will correct it, just as you would one revealed in the child's telling the story. You will take care never to suggest a drawing when the story is one that would be hard for a child to illustrate, or when his attempt would be apt to lead to misconceptions.

(3) Playing the story. Children are naturally dramatic. They take keen delight in acting out a story. It is the spirit of make-believe play. Each little actor, creating his own part, himself lives in the story and expresses in the most natural way possible its meaning to him. He has the most concrete of social motives for his expression of the truth, for he feels the motive that the one in the story himself felt.

Teachers in the public schools are just beginning to understand what an instrument is afforded them by this natural instinct for dramatic expression. It is plain how it lends itself to the teaching of reading and composition and to the development of a love for good literature. The class is never ready to stop with the first impromptu acting out of a story; they want to try again and improve their presentation.

The Sunday school might well learn something here from the experience of the public school. There is no reason why children should not act out Bible stories just as they do others. There is no irreverence in the thought, provided we choose such stories as do not necessitate any one's acting the part of God or of Jesus.

The first of these forms of reproduction—the child's telling the story—is obviously the most usable. It never loses its charm, and may be used with any story. All three methods may be used in the beginners' department as well as the primary, to the degree that you find them, by actual experience, to be adapted to the particular children you have to teach.

The time for the first reproduction of a story is on the Sunday following its presentation; and after that it may be retold or reacted as often as seems worth while. The period for reproduction should be the first of the two instruction periods, the second being given to telling the new story. This applies as well to the beginners' department as to the primary. In each, whatever work the children do at home throughout the week should be about the story told on the previous Sunday and in preparation for its reproduction, rather than in anticipation of the new story that is to come. In this respect the story method of teaching differs from the other methods which we have discussed. Its home work comes after the presentation of the lesson story; they involve an assignment of new material for study, in preparation for the class presentation.

Write out a version for telling as a story, of one of the lessons named in the list from which you were asked to choose in writing your first paper. Give age and sex of class for which this version is intended.

LESSON VIII

THE ART OF QUESTIONING

It is of the utmost importance that the teacher know how to ask questions. By stories and other illustrative material he may present the truth clearly and vividly, and appeal to interest and imagination, to feeling and action; but it is by questions that he stirs his pupils to think it over for themselves, to digest and assimilate it and to make it a permanent mental possession. If the story is the most effective means of presentation, the question is the great instrument of association.

Questioning is an art, and like all arts can be but imperfectly embodied in rules. Yet there are certain general characteristics of good questions that may be set down.

I. THE QUESTION SHOULD BE CLEAR AND DEFINITE. It should ask only one thing, and that so directly that there is no chance of mistake.

(1) Avoid technical expressions and big words; as, What are the conditions of sanctification, and how does it differ from regeneration? Does the divinity of Jesus imply His impeccability? In the Sunday school, at least, we need to get away from artificial and technical terminology. If religion means to us what it ought, we can express it in the same language that we use for common, everyday matters.

(2) Avoid figures of speech, unless the question itself deal with their explanation. Use the most simple and direct statement possible. Do you think the penitent thief will be present at the marriage supper of the Lamb? In what sort of ground did Paul sow the seed at Corinth? are examples of questions made less definite than they might be, because a figure of speech is used to express what could be put in literal terms. We make it worse, of course, if we mix figures, as, How does the Good Shepherd wash away sin?

(3) Do not ask questions that are vague because they admit of many answers. A teacher once asked, "What must we do before our sins can be forgiven?"—and a little girl replied quite correctly, "We must sin first." Such a question as How did Saul treat David? needs qualification. Put thus, it might be answered in many ways: Made him court minstrel, appointed him armor-bearer, gave him his daughter in marriage, grew jealous of him, tried to kill him, drove him into outlawry, swore to a covenant with him at En-gedi.

(4) Avoid double questions. These may be of various sorts. The least objectionable are those which unite two questions, each of which is in itself legitimate; as, Of whom did Saul become jealous, and why? Ask both questions, but ask one at a time. A more serious fault is the assumption as premise of that which is itself questionable; as, Why cannot a man sin who lets Christ enter his heart? Why did Paul fail at Athens? There are prior questions here: Does faith in Christ make it impossible for a man to sin? Did Paul fail at Athens? Ask these first; then the others may rightly follow. The poorest of all questions are those which ask so much that they give an inadequate clue as to what is asked. Examples are: Who killed a thousand men with what strange weapon? Who, in to-day's lesson, was coming into what city, and how? These are not questions; they are conundrums. Yet interrogations of this sort are by no means uncommon. Professor De Garmo quotes this from a list of examination questions actually used in a secondary school: "Who chased whom around the walls of what?"

(5) Do not confuse the pupil by a multitude of words, by auxiliary clauses and parenthetical explanations. Under this head may be included also the habit of attempting to put life into the teaching by superfluous remarks and playful familiarity. Nowhere is this more out of place than in asking questions.

(6) A common source of vagueness is the use, without qualification, of general and indefinite verbs, such as have, do, be, become, happen. Examples: What happens when you tell a lie? What do you do when you go to bed? What did Abel have that Cain did not? What is the new name that is promised to him that overcometh? What do we become when we are baptized?

2. THE QUESTION SHOULD BE SO PUT AS TO STIMULATE REAL THOUGHT. The pupil should be compelled to go to his ideas for the answer.

(1) Avoid questions that suggest the answer in any such way that it comes as the result of the merely mechanical working of the laws of association. Yes-and-No questions are usually to be avoided for this reason, though they are sometimes perfectly legitimate. The test is—do they make the pupil think? “Pumping” questions appeal to mere mechanical memory or to guessing. Example: James and John were —? Brothers. And they were sons of —? Thunder. No, they were called that; but they were really the sons of Z—? Zacchæus. No, Zeb—? Zebedee.

When two or more words go together to form one idea, they should not be broken apart, putting one in the question to suggest the other in the answer. Examples: What did Samuel offer when he went to Jesse’s home? Sacrifice. What did Jesus break with His disciples? Bread. What did He give first? Thanks.

The question should not be asked in the same words that were used for the original presentation of the truth asked for; nor should the teacher ever be content to get back an answer in the same words that he used to impart it. Such an exercise proves that the pupil caught the words of the teaching, but it does not show that he got the idea. Put the question in terms that cannot subconsciously suggest the words needed to meet it; insist that the pupil answer in language of his own. One application of this principle must be made explicit. Do not, as a rule, use the words of Scripture in your questions.

(2) Be careful not to encourage guessing. If the answer be not forthcoming, it is idle to keep putting the question, in the hope that repetition may coax it out. And it is worse than idle to reject an answer that is honest and partly right, just because it does not chance to be the one of which you are thinking. Teachers exist who have been known to say: "Yes, you are right; but it is not the answer that I have in mind." "Yes, that is true; but it is not what I meant."

We dare never forget that we ask questions not just for sake of getting correct answers, but for sake of leading the pupil to think, to know and understand the truth. A wrong answer is often more useful than a right one. If it reveals the pupil's real thought about the matter in hand, and so shows us his misconception of the truth, it is of far more value than a perfectly correct guess or veneer of memory. It enables us to diagnose the case. It gives us insight into the pupil's need; and we can set to work to meet it.

(3) Give the pupil a chance to think for himself. Let him answer questions in his own way. Over-questioning defeats its own end. It takes away the pupil's self-activity. It weakens his power of thought and expression. It makes him dependent upon the continual stimulus of questions.

3. QUESTIONS SHOULD DEAL WITH ESSENTIALS. For sake of perspective, do not ask for unimportant details. To ask a question emphasizes the thing asked for. It becomes the center of thought for the moment. It gets impressed upon the pupil's mind, and acquires dignity and importance in his eyes. It is one of the chief functions of the question, therefore, to direct attention to the salient facts of the lesson and to guide the thought of the pupil to its essential truths.

The question itself, moreover, should have apperceptive and associative value. The question and its answer should be worth putting together. It is possible to ask about an important fact in a very unimportant way. For example: What did Jesus do next? What truth do we find in the next verse? What story did Jesus tell in to-day's lesson? Such questions as these are formal and meaningless. The facts they point toward may be of vital importance; but what they actually ask about those facts is not worth mentioning, much less remembering.

The fitting together of question and answer is a golden opportunity to make an association. Interest is alert, attention centered upon its problem, the mind active. It is the time to put together the things we would have stay together in the pupil's mind. The question should supply the one term, the answer the other, of an association of ideas that has permanent value. What did Jesus do when He saw that His disciples would not wash one another's feet? What story did He tell when a lawyer asked Him whom to consider a neighbor?—are forms that have associative value.

4. QUESTIONS SHOULD BE PUT IN LOGICAL ORDER. Each question should grow out of what went before it, and lead up to what comes after. The whole should issue in a coherent presentation of the truth. It is harder to keep to the point, of course, when questions are asked and the discussion of the hour is live and genuinely co-operative, than it would be if the teacher were to do all the work and simply deliver a carefully prepared lecture. But it can be done.

5. QUESTIONS SHOULD BE SO PUT AS TO KEEP THE WHOLE CLASS INTERESTED AND AT WORK. Aside from their content, this depends upon a few simple rules of method:

(1) Do not rely upon concert answers. It is one of the surest ways not to keep the whole class at work. You must bring the questions home individually. Call upon particular pupils to answer.

(2) Ask the question first, then call upon the one who is to answer. Each member of the class should feel that the question is addressed to him, since he may be called upon to answer it.

(3) Call upon particular pupils several times in the course of a single recitation. Do not let a pupil feel that after he has answered his question, made his report or discussed his topic, his work is over for the day.

(4) Do not repeat a question if the pupil failed to understand it because of inattention. Go to another for the answer. Even if the failure is due to inability to understand its meaning, it is best to let someone else answer; then recast and explain it if necessary.

(5) Do not repeat the pupil's answer. The class should be trained to pay as careful attention to one another's answers as to the teacher's questions and explanations.

(6) Do not get into the habit of calling most often upon your best pupils, and letting the weaker sit idle. We face a dilemma here. The weaker pupils need the questions most; yet when we call upon them the class hour drags and the discussion loses its interest. We need the help of the brighter pupils to keep things moving, and they deserve the chance to contribute to the development of the truth; yet we must not neglect the weaker.

(7) Do not let pupils get into the habit of failing to answer your questions, and become content to fail. Never give one up or let him feel that his case is hopeless. Keep at him till you find a "point of contact." Your work, like that of any teacher, is individual.

6. THE QUESTIONS SHOULD MAINTAIN THE SOCIAL MOTIVE OF THE HOUR. They should express the natural give-and-take of social co-operation in the discovery and discussion of the truth. You will, therefore, encourage freedom of thought and expression. You will respect the pupil's answers, if they be sincere. And you will be ready in turn to answer his questions, and will do your best to meet his difficulties.

To ask questions from a printed list in the text-book, or even to read off questions from a list that you have yourself prepared, is to fail unpardonably. This does not mean that you should not prepare questions beforehand. It is well even to write some out, that you may get them clearly in mind. But leave all notes behind when you come to the class. Let no paper come between yourself and your pupils. Better to make some mistakes in the course of teaching that is live and personal, than to be faultlessly logical because mechanical.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DIS-CUSSION

Write out a dozen or more questions which you will use in the lesson described in your first three papers, distinguishing those used in the step of preparation from those intended to test the pupil's mastery of assigned material, and again from those intended to lead him to think out the relations of the lesson facts and formulate his conclusion. Give a half dozen or more examples of faulty questions that you have observed, showing why each is faulty.

LESSON IX

DRILLS, REVIEWS AND EXAMINATIONS

1. MEMORY WORK should have an increasing place in the three lower departments, culminating in the Junior. The beginners may learn little Bible verses; the primary pupils will memorize longer verses and hymns. The juniors are in the "golden memory period." They should store the mind with such Bible passages and religious forms as they ought to remember word for word in after life.

(1) The material for memorization should be carefully selected. It is a waste of energy to commit a "Golden Text" each Sunday, unless that text be of permanent spiritual value. In general, we should aim to have our pupils memorize only those Bible passages, hymns and forms as they ought to retain throughout life, laid up in the mind and always available, a precious spiritual resource. If the memory material be of this sort, memory work should be continued throughout the higher departments of the school, reviewing and keeping alive what was acquired in the lower departments, as well as adding to it.

(2) Memory work requires actual class drill. It is not enough to "hear the children say" the verses they are supposed to have learned at home, and help them out when they stumble. You must squarely face the fact that most children will not learn their verses at home. You should teach them yourself. You should by drill help them to memorize what they ought.

(3) Memory drill depends upon the law of habit. Two conditions must be fulfilled: (a) The pupil must put his whole attention upon the material to be learned, apprehending it clearly and distinctly; (b) there must be sufficient repetition to fix it.

(4) The time for drill should be early in the hour, before the pupil has begun to tire and while his power of attention is unjaded. It is a mistake to assume, as many teachers do, that memory work, being mechanical, can be done at any time. It demands the most favorable conditions. Teacher and pupils should be at their best.

(5) You must make sure that the pupil understands clearly and definitely just what he is to learn. Mere concert repetition amounts to little; there must be individual drill as well. If the children can read, the material to be learned should be presented to their eyes as well as to their ears. It is wrong to maintain that a child should commit nothing that he does not comprehend, for the full meaning of many precious verses can be realized only in later life. Yet we seldom err on this side. And certainly a child should never memorize anything that he cannot understand in some degree. We should always explain the meaning of that which we ask him to commit, and make sure that he gets it. A young woman who is now a missionary in the Far East, admitted that until her senior year in college she thought that "Ebenezer" meant "voice," having learned in early childhood the hymn, 'Here I raise mine Ebenezer.'

(6) Repetition is monotonous work; and your ingenuity will at times be taxed to hold the pupils to it. In general, however, they like it better than you do, for the primitive rhythmic instinct is strong within them. The best way to hold them is to put life into the drill. Make it quick and snappy. Children like a brisk mental exercise. Introduce variety by alternating concert with individual recitations. Let one pupil begin a verse and another finish it. Get competition between this boy and that, or between sections of the class; or train your class for competition with another.

Give only so much time to each pupil called on; if one fails, go on to the next, and later help him individually. Do not waste the time of the class and wear out their patience by dealing too long with individual cases of stupidity or lack of effort. Take them separately and in private. The old system of prizes for verses learned had better be given up.

(7) There should be frequent review. Do not drop a passage after it has been learned. Keep calling for it from time to time. Keep all the old material fresh. Help your pupils to acquire a permanent body of Scripture, hymns and prayers that will be available when needed.

2. REVIEWS. All Sunday schools have review Sundays; but not nearly all teachers know how to use them. The common mistake is to use the review simply to refresh the pupil's memory. But mere repetition is not review. It is for sake of perspective and organization that we look back over the lessons of a series. The pupil, having gotten the whole, is now able to see the parts in right relation. He can now understand the bearing of particular events and lessons upon one another, and is prepared to unify and systematize his ideas.

The review should mean, not merely seeing again, but seeing in a new light. Each lesson has presented facts worth remembering, truths worth keeping. But if these are rightly to be understood and really to be kept and used, they must not be left as a mere series, without connection save that this was taught on the Sunday after that and before this other. There is historical continuity and logical relationship there. And the teacher fails who does not bring the pupil to realize these connections and so help him to systematize and unify his ideas. Quite as important as the getting of impressions is their organization into a coherent and usable system. Much of this, of course, can be done from Sunday to Sunday, as the teacher seeks to couple each lesson with those that went before and those to come. But the pupil cannot grasp the full bearing of part upon part until he has gotten the whole and stands upon the vantage-ground of review.

Any method of review that will afford a genuine perspective and rightly accomplish this work of organization, has its place. Methods that but repeat matters already gone over or that drill the memory only, are insufficient. Methods that string the lessons of the series along a fanciful acrostic, that for novelty organize them about some theme other than their real one, or that permit the review to degenerate into a lot of detail-hunting catch-questions, are illegitimate.

The best methods, in general, involve the use of a topical outline, covering the salient points of the subject-matter in logical or chronological order. If possible, it is best to have each pupil make his own outline, to have several such outlines presented in class, to discuss and rework them, and, finally, to get out of them an outline which will express the united judgment of class and teacher. If pupils are unwilling or unable to make their own outlines, topics or questions may be assigned them and reports asked for, of such a character that they may be used as a basis for discussion and the preparation in class of an outline. To give an examination is an excellent method of review, provided the examination questions are of the right sort and are afterward discussed in class. Pupils may be asked to write a short history of the period covered, a little drama presenting some of its events, or an essay upon some assigned topic which will lead to a review of the whole. If none of these methods are practicable, an ordinary class discussion may serve well, provided the teacher leads it into the right channels. With the younger pupils, and with those who cannot be gotten to do much work, the review may well take the form of a story or talk by teacher or superintendent, illustrated by blackboard, stereopticon or pictures.

Opportunity should always be given in review for the pupil to ask questions. It is the teacher's last chance to remove misconceptions, to fill up gaps and to put things in right relation.

3. EXAMINATIONS are so much misunderstood and misused in public school and college that most teachers do not even think of their use in the Sunday school. Their function is conceived to be that merely of testing the pupil's knowledge. But if this were their only value, they might well be dispensed with. Any teacher can tell without them what progress his pupil has been making, what work he is prepared to do next, and so whether he deserves promotion.

The true function of the examination, like that of the review, is the organization of the pupil's knowledge. The examination is given, not for the teacher's sake, but for the pupil's. It supplies a motive for thorough work and a stimulus to final organization, that can be secured in no other way. And if the examination questions be rightly put, they in themselves constitute points of view which almost compel a true perspective.

"The function of the examination as a test of the pupil's knowledge is not of paramount importance, but its function as an organizing agency of knowledge is supreme. . . . The virtue of the examination lies in its power to force strenuous mental effort to the task of organizing a large body of facts and principles into a coherent system. This is the standard by which examination questions should be set. They should be large and comprehensive, so formulated that they will bring out and exercise, not the memory for details, but the capacity to grasp large masses of knowledge and weld the separate facts and principles into systematic unities." *

Examinations are worth while, moreover, as a test of the teacher's work. If a considerable number of any teacher's pupils are unable to pass a creditable examination, it is evidence that there is something wrong with his teaching. A careful study of his pupils' failures will reveal to him not only what gaps he must fill up in their knowledge of the subject, but where he may improve his presentation and improve his method.

If these be the functions of the written examination, it is just as much needed in the Sunday school as in the public school. Indeed, it is more needed. The public school is able to use methods of compulsion which the Sunday school cannot; it has more time at its disposal, a better standardized curriculum and better trained teachers—for all of which reasons it might more easily dispense with examinations and yet maintain a high standard of work.

We need not fear that examinations will be unpopular and drive pupils from school, if we administer them with a degree of common sense.

"At first, at least, the examinations may be made optional, no pupil being obliged to take them, but all being encouraged to do so. . . . The examination should not cover a long period, probably not to exceed three months, though when the system is fairly under way an annual examination might be given for those who are willing to take it. . . . The examination should not be a mere test of memory. Its educational purpose should be distinctly kept in mind. If the questions are rightly framed, so as to constitute a real review of the main features of the quarter's work, they may very properly be put into the hands of the pupils on one

* Bagley, "The Educative Process," pp. 333, 334.

Sunday, to be returned with the answers a week later, the pupils being instructed to make use of the Bible and any other accessible sources of information, personal help only being excluded." *

Another method is to give out from twenty-five to fifty questions, so framed as to constitute a thorough review, with the statement that on the following Sunday an examination will be conducted, at which pupils will be expected to write, without assistance of any sort, answers to four or five questions which the teacher will choose from this list.

The questions should, of course, be suited to the maturity of the class. Examinations may be given with success in the Junior department and in those above it. As soon as pupils are able to write easily and have become accustomed to examinations in the public school, they are ready for examinations in the Sunday school as well.

The examination should be made something of an occasion. Otherwise it will not constitute a sufficient stimulus. It should be announced far enough ahead; it should be carefully administered and supervised; the papers should be graded with scrupulous fairness; and recognition should be given to those who pass creditably—a report sent to parents, a list announced or posted, promotion to a higher class, a certificate given for each examination passed, or a diploma at the completion of a course covering several years of work. The pupil's full grade, however, should not depend on the examination. It should be made up on the basis of the class-room work, the notebook or other routine written or manual work, and the examination.

The teacher ought always to read and grade the papers before the next meeting of the class. Then, if the full benefit of the examination is to be realized, there should be a free discussion of the questions. Such a discussion is both more economical and more satisfactory in result than correcting and handing back the papers. It is a golden opportunity for final review. On the one hand the pupils are eager and interested to know how well they have succeeded; on the other hand their answers have revealed to the teacher what misconceptions need correcting and what gaps need filling, that the work of the term may be brought to its proper conclusion.

* Burton and Mathews: "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday School," pp. 159, 160.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

Write out twenty-five review questions for the work of the last quarter in your class. Let them be of such a character that a selection may be made from them to constitute an examination. If practicable, put them in the hands of your pupils for home study, and then conduct such an examination. Report in writing the results of your experiment.

LESSON X

MAKING THE APPLICATION

The final goal of our work is moral and spiritual. The Sunday school fails that lacks the evangelistic motive. Its supreme aim should be identical with that of the church—to secure a commitment of the life to God through Jesus Christ, to provide opportunities for Christian service and to promote growth in Christian character.

I. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL'S INSTRUCTION, THEREFORE, SHOULD ISSUE IN PRACTICAL CONCLUSIONS. It should lead the pupil to spiritual insights and beget within him a sense of concrete moral obligations.

This does not mean that the same truths are to be taught in every grade, or that every lesson should end with a spiritual application. It does mean that the teaching should be the expression of the teacher's own life with God and his steadfast purpose to guide his pupils to that life; and that it should be grounded in his sympathetic discernment of the truth as revealed in God's Word and his endeavor to give that truth to his pupils.

The great question is: Should the teacher state the practical conclusion and make the application for his pupils, or should he let them do this for themselves? Should his appeal to heart and conscience and will be direct or indirect? It is hard to lay down general rules. Here, if anywhere, the teacher's work must be personal and individual. There are two reasons, however, why the indirect method is usually better:

(a) If the teacher makes the application for his pupils, there is danger lest in their minds his authority be substi- tuted for that of the truth itself. They may feel that it is but his conclusion, and a mere matter of opinion. Even so, they may accept it for a time. But the spiritual life can finally rest upon no authority other than the inward appeal of the truth itself. Life's ultimate convictions are grounded, not in what teachers say or churches formulate, or even in the Bible as an external authority forced upon us from above, but in the soul's natural response to the truth of God. If we will but get the real meaning of His Word to men and present it clearly and concretely to our pupils, we need add no application of our own. They, too, will feel its truth and power. It will beget within them convictions which are abiding because the expression of their own deepest impulses and aspirations.

(b) Indirect suggestion is usually more potent than direct suggestion. The strength of a suggested idea depends upon its ability to keep itself before the mind, and so to issue in action. And this ability depends in great part, it is clear, upon the absence of conflicting ideas which might claim the attention and inhibit action. A little child will believe and act upon anything you tell him, just because he lacks the critical ideas which experience alone can bring.

As we grow up and experiences accumulate and judgment matures, we become less open to direct suggestion. The presentation of any idea arouses within us a host of images, memories and other ideas, any one of which may be more attractive than that presented, and may take possession of the mind to its exclusion. And if we are conscious that an effort is being made to influence our thinking or conduct, that very fact marshals conflicting ideas within us. We naturally put ourselves into an attitude of defence; we resist the intrusion of the foreign thought. If, on the other hand, the idea be introduced easily and indirectly, without shock or palpable effort to influence;

if we are given, instead of a ready-made conclusion, the material from which to draw one of our own—it then seems a natural part of ourselves, holds our interest and influences action.

The Bible is full of illustrations of the power of indirect suggestion. Sir Joshua Fitch has given an admirable description of how Nathan used this method to teach David the greatest lesson of his life:

“When Nathan was commissioned to reprove David, you know that if he had gone at once, and taxed him with the offence, and said, ‘You have committed a great sin, and I have come to rebuke you,’ David would probably have been prepared with some answer. That was a form of accusation which he very likely anticipated, and we do not doubt he had so armed himself with pleas of self-justification, and so skillfully ‘managed’ his conscience, that the charge would scarcely have impressed him at all. But instead of this, the prophet began to tell him a narrative: ‘There were two men in one city, the one rich and the other poor.’ He went on further, as you know, detailing the various incidents of his story, until ‘David’s anger was greatly kindled against the man,’ and he exclaimed, ‘As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die.’ Not till the solemn words, ‘Thou art the man!’ had been uttered in his hearing, did the conviction come thoroughly home to his heart that he was really guilty. Now, why was it that Nathan’s method was so effective? Because David had listened with interest to the story without supposing that it concerned him. His judgment was clear and unbiassed, and he came to the right conclusion before he perceived that the conclusion applied to himself. How much deeper and more permanent was the impression thus made than if the prophet had confined himself to a plain literal examination of the right and wrong of David’s own case. And we may see the same thing illustrated in our Lord's parables constantly, that they not only chain the attention of the listener by their pictorial character, but they set him thinking for himself, and drawing inferences about truths of the highest value almost without being aware of it. The most effective lessons which enter the human heart are not those which take the form of lessons. It is when we are least conscious of the process by which we are impressed that we are impressed most deeply." *

Jesus used this method constantly. It is one reason why He taught so much by stories. When the lawyer, "desiring to justify himself," asked "Who is my neighbor?" Jesus gave no direct answer, but began to tell a story. He told how a man was beset by robbers in a lonely road, and left naked and half dead; how in turn a priest and a Levite came that way and saw him lying, but "passed by on the other side"; how finally a Samaritan was "moved with compassion" and cared for him. The story ended with a question: "Which of these three, thinkest thou, proved neighbor unto him that fell among the robbers?" "He that showed mercy on him," came the answer. Only then, when the lawyer had gotten the idea for himself, did Jesus drive home the obligation: "Go, and do thou likewise."

In general, then, the indirect method of getting moral and spiritual conclusions is the better. It is, indeed, but an application of the principles of self-activity and apperception. Better to get the pupil to think for himself than to think for him. It is harder, of course. It means that you must present the material so concretely and vividly that your pupils will be sure to get the right conclusion.

Two qualifications must be made: (a) With little children the direct method may and must be used—because they are as yet unable to reason clearly for themselves, because they have implicit faith in the authority of those they love, because their minds are peculiarly open to direct suggestion. Only gradually is direct to be replaced with indirect suggestion. (b) There are times when, in every grade and for every pupil, the teacher should directly, clearly and forcibly state the practical application of the truth. That teacher will fail who is afraid ever to appeal directly to the conscience and will of his pupil. The indirect method is often not in itself enough. Nathan followed his story with "Thou art the man"; Jesus turned the lawyer's conclusion into an obligation—"Go, and do thou likewise." Direct suggestion is at times needed, not as a substitute for indirect, but as its culmination. Do first all that you can to make the pupil see the truth for himself; then do not be afraid to apply it frankly, if you feel that such directness is needed to crystallize his convictions.

2. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL SHOULD ENDEAVOR TO LEAD EVERY PUPIL TO FAITH IN JESUS CHRIST AS SAVIOUR. The Sunday school teacher must not ignore the presence of sin in human life. Instruction alone will not save from the death which follows upon sin. Each pupil must be won to faith in the only Saviour from sin and death, or the Sunday school has failed in its most important work.

The sense of sin changes with the maturing of conscience. The little child may have his own feeling of wrong doing and need of the forgiveness of the heavenly Father. The Junior boy and girl will have a simple understanding of Jesus as their Saviour and be ready to accept Him when sympathetically presented. We will anxiously watch the pupils progress through the early and middle teens until the great decision has been made and acknowledged, if for any reason it has been delayed. Back of all our efforts for the Senior and Adult will be a deep concern, if they are not confessed believers in Jesus Christ.

3. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL SHOULD GIVE ITS PUPILS SOMETHING TO DO AND ORGANIZE THEM IN ACTUAL CHRISTIAN SERVICE. It should not stop with instruction. Religion is a life. We learn by doing. Both because it is religious and because it is educational, therefore, the Sunday school should organize its pupils for action. It should provide for the expression of the truths it seeks to teach, and for the carrying out in life of the ideals it presents.

We have already laid great stress upon the principle, "No impression without expression." We must now give to it a deeper meaning. In the moral and spiritual realm, there is no genuine expression save that of deeds. Not what your pupil can tell of Bible stories or the glibness with which he can recite texts, not the neatness of his written work, the precision of his maps, or the beauty of the models he has constructed, measure the success of your teaching; but rather the life he leads. The only true preparation for life is life itself; the only effective training for service is to serve. Every Sunday school class should organize for service. It should get something to do that is of real social value. It should hold its pupils by their common interest in this concrete piece of work. It should express its ideals in real endeavor.

4. This conception of the Sunday school recognizes THE CLASS AS A NATURAL UNIT OF SOCIAL AND RELIGIOUS LIFE. It makes of the school in no unreal sense a federation of classes.

(1) The teaching, work and organization should be carefully graded. Life's changes are nowhere more evident than in the varying social attitudes of later childhood and adolescence. The content of the teaching, the type of class organization, and the character of the Christian service which it may seek to accomplish, must be determined with full regard to the natural interests of the pupils, the stage of moral development reached, and the opportunities and temptations of their social environment. In the Junior department there may be a class of Boy Scouts, and one of girls who are interested in getting a Christmas tree ready for a children's hospital; in the Intermediate and Senior departments you may find one band making a study of missions in India and supporting a native preacher; while another, of older pupils, is interested in problems of philanthropy and the work of social settlements. Each has its particular work to do, and each an organization of its own.

(2) This conception of the Sunday school makes practicable the co-ordination of all the Church's educational agencies. We have multiplied organizations as new needs have been recognized, until the very strenuousness of our efforts defeats itself. Besides the Sunday school, there are boys' clubs and girls' clubs, gymnasium classes and athletic teams, mission bands for all ages from the tiny tots up, junior, intermediate and senior young people's societies, aid societies, the King's Daughters, and the men's brotherhoods. There is overlapping of function, in coordination of effort, and a waste of energy. There would be a great increase of efficiency if each church were to bring all its educational agencies under one organization. Methods may of course vary. There may simply be a committee of the church to mark out the fields of the respective organizations and bring about the needed unity of effort. A federation of societies may be organized as a "Church School," of which each would be a part. The societies, as a school of practice, may be correlated with the various grades of the Sunday school, as a school of instruction. The simplest plan would seem to be their incorporation within the Sunday school itself. Our conception of the class as a unit of social and religious life makes this quite possible.

(3) This conception of the Sunday school makes possible a definite co-operation with home and public school. If we ask parents and school teachers to help us teach religious truths to our pupils, we get little response. But if we organize to do something of social value, they can and will co-operate.

5. THE ORGANIZED ADULT CLASS stands naturally at the head of such a federation of classes into a school of Christian service. It differs from others only in that its interests are mature, its grasp of Christian problems and opportunities more broad, its temper more truly practical, its standards of efficiency more exacting, and democracy more essential in its work and organization. Let the particular form of organization be what it will—the men's brotherhood, the women's missionary society, the mothers' club, the young men's league—each should itself become part of the Sunday school, or maintain an adult class in the Sunday school. None need surrender its independence of organization; it should be required simply to register its distinctive educational work as one of the elective courses of the advanced department.

The advantages of such a plan are manifold. We name only a few: (a) Co-ordination of educational work and unity of practical effort within the church; (b) the practical service of the adult organizations will be more enlightened, since the educational motive remains; (c) the children's practical service will acquire dignity in their eyes, because adults, too, are seen to share the same motive and to work through the same institution; (d) there will be no evident time of graduation from the Sunday school.

FOR INVESTIGATION, WRITTEN REPORT AND DISCUSSION

What is your class undertaking in the way of Christian service, and why has it chosen just this specific form? Does this form of Christian service bear any relation to the instruction material which the class is studying? If a closer relation seems desirable between the class instruction and the class activity, what practical suggestions do you have to make toward bringing this about?

ADDENDA TO POINT 5, SECTION 3, PAGE 90.

The teacher's general preparation must include a deepening Christian experience, including definiteness and growth in prayer. The successful teacher is in partnership with unseen, spiritual forces. God will reveal Himself in and through the believer who walks in the divine fellowship. Neglect of prayer means loss of power and defeat.

LESSON I

THE TEACHER'S STUDY OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST

In the modern Sunday school everything is for the sake of the pupil. "The need of the pupil is the law of the school." In accord with this law the growing tendency in recent years has been for Teacher Training courses to take the child as the point of departure. Since this is confidently believed to be a sound principle, the course of which these lessons are a part begins with the study of the pupil. The study of the principles of teaching naturally follows. Having completed these sections of the course, we come to a study of lesson materials.

Contributing to this new emphasis upon child study has been the recognition that some of the most ineffective teaching of children has been done by the people who knew their Bible best. They had an adult's acquaintance with the Bible, but they did not know children. Being ignorant of child nature, its interests and needs, they were almost wholly unsuccessful in teaching the Bible. The pious Puritan knew his Bible, but he did not know his child, and as a result he was often a failure as a religious teacher.

THE TEACHER'S STUDY OF THE BIBLE

2. How should a teacher study the Bible? Assuming that a teacher, or one preparing to be a teacher, has made a study of child nature, how should he study the Bible? What form of Bible study will be most helpful to him as a teacher? In the past it has been generally assumed that the best methods of Bible study for teachers are those most profitable to any Christian. We cannot allow this idea to remain unchallenged. The teacher should study the Bible in those ways which will aid him most in using it effectively in nurturing the religious life of his pupils. He has placed himself in the way of obeying Jesus' command, "Feed my lambs," and his first duty is to prepare himself to do it. He will not neglect the study of the Bible for the sake of strengthening his own inner life and for this purpose he will study it as any other Christian studies it. But he has taken for his motto, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," and having done so he studies the Bible in the light of the needs of his pupils.

The teacher's question in Bible study. The teacher's problem becomes that of the selection of Biblical material for each period of the pupil's development. His question in Bible study is this: The pupil being what he is, what lesson materials will most effectively meet his religious needs? It is evident that a complete answer to this question requires a study of the entire Bible. It also requires the study of other lesson material than that contained in the Bible. A study of such broad scope is obviously impossible within the limits of an elementary Teacher Training course. But even in a brief course a beginning can be made. It is, therefore, proposed that we take a part of the Bible, the gospels, which present the earthly life of our Lord, and examine them in the light of our acquaintance with the interests and needs of pupils of the various grades.

WHAT THIS COURSE OF LESSONS IS

This course of lessons is Bible study. It is not primarily a study of Bible facts. It is a study in appreciation. It is a search for life values. It is a typical example of the proper selection and use of Biblical material for the grades.

Sunday school teachers are not required to select their own lessons. Lessons already prepared are placed in their hands for teaching. But it is exceedingly important that teachers shall not be ignorant of the reasons why particular lessons have been chosen for use with children of a given age. To teach effectively, teachers must be acquainted with the principles upon which the choice of lessons has been made. They need to know the nature of the child and they need also to know the nature of the lessons, and the reasons why particular lessons are believed to meet the needs of the child. Beyond this, they need also to know the interrelation of these two; that is, how the particular lessons chosen work out in the life of the child, what service they perform in his life.

This course of lessons is method study. It is a study in how to teach the life of Christ. But it is method study in the large, not in an exact or detailed sense. It presupposes some acquaintance with the general principles of the learning process and discusses them only incidentally. It presupposes also that a study has been made of the religious needs of the pupil. Our first question, therefore, is: What kind of lessons are required for the satisfaction of these needs? In this question we have in mind actual, present needs of the pupil. We seek lesson materials that will help him in the solution of present practical problems; that will enter immediately into his life in helpful service.

Our second question is: Is there material in the gospels which answers to this description? This is followed by these inquiries: What is this material? Why is it fitted to meet the pupil's need? How does it work out in his life?

WHY THE LIFE OF CHRIST IS CHOSEN FOR STUDY

Christ is central in Sunday-school teaching. It is eminently fitting that in the teacher's study of the Bible a beginning should be made with the life of Christ. The purpose of the Sunday school is to aid its pupils to know him whom to know aright is life eternal. A school implies learners. Members of the Sunday school are learners of a particular kind; they are disciples. Its members attend that they may learn of Christ, believe in him, and become like him. The goal is Christlikeness in character and in service.

The purpose of the Sunday school in common with all schools is to aid its pupils to attain knowledge, character, and efficiency. But we are Christians, and the Sunday school is a Christian school. As Christians, Jesus Christ is to us "the way, the truth and the life." As a Christian school, the knowledge which the Sunday school seeks to impart is the truth as it is in Jesus Christ; the character which it seeks to create is the life manifested in him; the efficiency which it aims to develop is efficiency in his service.

It is the purpose of the Sunday school to aid its pupils in attaining knowledge. It seeks to lead them into possession of fundamental religious beliefs, into right views of God, of man, of human duty and destiny. "I am the truth," said Jesus. More than ever before the Christian world in our age accepts him at his word. Jesus himself is central in Christian thinking. He is accepted as the Christian creed. In his person and work and teaching we find the highest expression of truth.

"He is the truth about God." "If ye had known me," he said, "ye would have known my Father also." The God in whom Christians believe is a Christlike God; he is God made manifest in Jesus Christ. In the person of Jesus and in his teachings we have the simplest, highest, and truest view of God ever given to the world. Where else can we go to learn about God? "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father; how sayest thou, show us the Father."

He is the truth about man. Jesus is religion's ideal man. In him we see the highest expression of the possibilities of human life,—man as God intended and intends him to be. He is our pattern. Beholding him, we see our goal of character,—to become like him. But Jesus does more for us than provide a perfect pattern for us to imitate. We not only see in him what God desires man to be; in coming into vital relationship with him our spirits are renewed, our motives and purposes are vitalized, and we receive from him power to realize our ideals. "I am the life," he said. He both shows men the perfect pattern of life and enables them to realize it. He makes the ideal which he shows to men live in them. His revelation concerning man is dynamic. It is not so much a revelation in words as it is a mediation of life.

"I am the way," said Jesus. Discipleship to the first Christians meant living according to Jesus' way. They referred to the Christian life as "the Way." It is the way of approach to God. "No man cometh unto the Father but by me," he said. It is the way of service. "Whosoever would become great among you, shall be your minister: and whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all." Its motive is love. "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; even as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." There is but one way to attain efficiency in Christ's service: by practice. The Sunday school must be a school of practice in living according to Jesus' way.

The gospels are central in the Sunday-school curriculum. All religious teaching reaches its highest point in the words of Jesus. The revelation through priests, prophets, sages, and apostles contained in the Bible attains its culmination in his teachings. It is here that we find the crowning element of revelation. Jesus and his words are the true norm of Christian teaching. This is the standard, and to this test we must bring all instruction offered for Sunday-school use. Whatever accords with his teaching, whatever passes the test of comparison with the principles and ideals manifested in him, is to be received. Whatever fails to accord with, or contradicts his teaching, whatever is proposed as a part of Sunday-school instruction, from whatever source which cannot live in spiritual harmony with his character and his teaching, is to be frankly recognized as falling short. Is this not to take him at his own word? "Ye have heard that it hath been said, . . . but I say unto you" (Matt. 5. 43, 44).

The curriculum of the Sunday school finds its life-center in Christ, even as we as Christians find our life-center in him. The gospels, therefore, cannot rightly be regarded as merely one among many sources of lessons for the Sunday school; they should be regarded as a chief source. We cannot be true to our faith and give an equal amount of time to each of the books of the Bible; we must give major time to the study of the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. As our faith is Christocentric, so must our Sunday schools be Christcentered.

Do we have in the gospels teaching material for the various grades? Do we find in them material for lessons for pupils of all departments? These are questions which this study undertakes to answer. Following four general studies on the subject matter of the gospels, we will consider the life of Christ in the light of the interests and needs of pupils of the different age periods.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Consider the words of Jesus to Peter recorded in John 21. 15-17. Do you think Jesus had children in mind when he said, "Feed my lambs"?

2. Read 1 Cor. 3. 1-2. Note that Paul compared some of his teaching to "milk" and some to "meat"; also, that he recognized that "milk" was for babes and "meat" for men. Compare Hebrews 5. 12-14.

3. Study Matt. 18. 1-14. The disciples had been disputing as to who should be first or greatest. What was Jesus' answer? Is it pleasing to Jesus for us to make the interests of the child first in our study?

4. What was Jesus' view of the importance of his teaching? In seeking an answer to this question, study among other passages the following: Luke 21. 33; John 12. 48; Luke 11. 29-32; John 8. 51-56; Matt. 5. 43-45.

5. What did the apostles think concerning the importance of Jesus' teaching? Consider the significance of Peter's words, John 6. 68.

6. Consider the significance of the passages in Acts which speak of the Christian life as Jesus' way, or "The Way;" Acts 9. 1-12; 16. 17; 18. 25-26; 19. 9; 23. 22. 4; 14. 22. (Note the reading in the American Revised Version.)

7. Consider the meaning and application of Jesus' statement in Matt. 23. 8.

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

(Each member of the class should write a brief statement on the questions under this head. If the nature of the topics permits observation, include in the written statement such observations as there may be opportunity to make. Discuss the topics with others as opportunity affords. Give thought to each. Send the written statement to the teacher in advance of the next meeting, that he may have it before him in preparing his plan for teaching the lesson.

These written statements represent the student's constructive work on the lesson, and are an important part of the lesson preparation. The purpose is: (1) to lead the student to formulate the results of his own thinking; (2) to direct his thoughts toward the topics of the next lesson; and (3) to aid the teacher or leader of the class to give each student the help he most needs.)

1. As a Sunday-school teacher have you found some lessons easier to teach than others? Why? Have some lessons seemed better adapted to the needs of your pupils than others?

2. What reasons of your own can you give for beginning the Teacher's Study of the Bible with a study of the Life and Teaching of Christ?

3. Make a list from memory of some of the outstanding events of the life of Christ.

LESSON II

THE LIFE OF CHRIST IN OUTLINE

The New Testament does not anywhere contain a biography of Jesus. All four of the gospels tell of the events of his public ministry, but no one of them attempts to supply a complete account of his life. However, we do find in them material from which an outline account of his life may be constructed. This requires a discriminating selection of material from each of the gospels, together with a comparison of statements and a rearrangement of their order of events. When this has been most carefully done there can be no certainty that the precise order in which the events occurred has been reproduced. Nor do we know the length of the public ministry. It is usually said to have been three years, but some scholars hold that it was much less. As the life of Jesus is made more vivid and real to us by a knowledge of the course of events, it is important that we perform this task of reconstructing as best we can a life of Christ in outline.

THE CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH OF JESUS

The infancy and early childhood. According to the accounts of both Matthew and Luke, Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the King (Matt. 2. 1. Luke 1. 5; 2. 1-7). From fear of Herod, Joseph and Mary, under divine guidance, fled to Egypt, from whence they returned after Herod's death to their home in Nazareth of Galilee.

One brief statement (Luke 2. 40-52), contains the only information concerning the childhood of Jesus furnished by the gospels. Luke's statement is invaluable for its facts and for its richness of suggestion. It pictures a normal, healthy boy, sound in body, of alert, eager mind, obedient and loyal to his earthly parents, beloved by them, and with the grace of God constantly upon him.

Youth. During his youth, Jesus worked at the handicraft of Joseph, who was a carpenter. Through diligent use of the opportunities of these years for study and training, and for the discipline of character, Jesus attained to that profound knowledge and wonderful understanding of the Old Testament, and to that perfection of character which were revealed early in his public ministry.

THE BEGINNINGS OF JESUS' MINISTRY

John, the Forerunner. The ministry of Jesus was preceded by that of John the Baptist, who came forth from the wilderness of Judea with a stern message of denunciation, warning, and demand for repentance.

The baptism and temptation. Jesus gave approval of John's work by presenting himself for baptism. At first John protested, but when Jesus declared that it was for him the fulfillment of righteousness he yielded and baptized him. Straightway the Holy Spirit came upon Jesus and he heard his call in the words, "Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased." Luke says in a parenthesis that Jesus was at this time about thirty years of age (Luke 3. 23). The divine attestation brought with it a special and conscious enduement of power, which was followed immediately by the temptation (Matt. 4. 1-11).

The early ministry in Judea. We are dependent upon the fourth gospel for an account of certain opening events of Jesus' ministry. These include the calling of the first disciples in Judea and the first miracle in Galilee, a visit to Jerusalem; preaching and baptizing in Judea; and a return to Galilee by way of Samaria (John 1. 19-4. 42).

THE GALILEAN MINISTRY

Early ministry in Galilee and first opposition. Mark indicates that Jesus' ministry very early centered in Galilee. He made Capernaum his place of residence, taught in the synagogues, healed the sick, and preached to the multitudes. From this busy center he went forth at frequent intervals to the surrounding villages, occasionally making a preaching tour to the farther parts of Galilee. He attracted a multitude of followers, all classes of people being represented among them, even publicans and sinners. Some became his devoted disciples. Among these Levi (the apostle Matthew) is especially mentioned. Most of the Scribes and Pharisees were inclined to be captious, seeking to entangle him with questions. As he refused to acknowledge the "oral law," the teaching of the rabbis, as binding, they began openly to oppose him. Jesus would not bow to their influence, but on the contrary publicly condemned them for their prevalent hypocrisy. (See, for example, Mark 2. 23-28; 3. 1-6.)

Choice of the Twelve and the Sermon on the Mount. By this time the fame of Jesus had so spread beyond Galilee even to Idumea and beyond Jordan that a great multitude were attracted to him. From among those who had declared their allegiance he appointed twelve "that they might be with him and that he might send them forth to preach." To them and the whole company of his disciples he delivered what came to be known as the Sermon on the Mount, the "Great Charter" of the New Kingdom.

The ministry of evangelization throughout Galilee. The twelve were not sent out immediately, but accompanied Jesus as he went "through cities and villages preaching and bringing the good tidings of the Kingdom of God" (Luke 8. 1). Wherever people gathered together to hear, Jesus taught them. Sometimes it was a small company. When opportunity offered he took the twelve apart by themselves that he might teach them. Especially when teaching the multitudes he used parables as a favorite form of teaching. This period witnessed some surpassing evidences of Jesus' power. The centurion's servant was healed at his word; the widow's son was raised at Nain; the tempest was stilled; Jairus' daughter was restored to life; a blind man was made to see, and a dumb man to speak (Luke 7. 1-17; 8. 22-25; 8. 40-56; Mark 8. 22-26; 9. 14-29).

The crisis in Galilee. As long as Jesus was comparatively unknown, the ruling parties among the Jews contented themselves with criticizing him on occasion and quietly using their influence against him. But now his widespread popularity threatened to undermine their power, or even to overthrow their leadership, and they became aggressively hostile. At this juncture, also, the fickleness of the populace was revealed. They wanted a leader who would use force, a Messiah who would organize revolt against Rome. On one occasion they attempted to make him their king (John 6. 15). Jesus would not accede to their demands. His kingdom, he declared, was to be established in the hearts of men. As the true import of his teaching became evident many turned away from him, including some of his professed disciples. In this hour of testing the twelve remained true. On a journey of retirement to Caesarea Philippi he asked them concerning their faith. Peter, as spokesman, declared their conviction: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16. 13-20). This was a great hour, both for the twelve and for the Master. His choice of them was vindicated. Gradually they had come to supreme faith in him, and in the hour of crisis their faith had stood the test.

The close of the Galilean ministry. The confession at Caesarea Philippi marked a turning point in Jesus' ministry.

Already Jesus had foreseen the inevitable result; now he begins to prepare the minds of his disciples for his rejection by the ecclesiastical leaders. The disciples protested vigorously, but Jesus declared that they themselves must meet a similar test,—readiness to lose their lives for his sake. Soon after this first definite teaching concerning rejection the transfiguration occurred. The first three Gospels all relate these three events and in the same order (Mark 8. 27 to 9. 13; Matt. 16. 13 to 17. 13; Luke 9. 18-36). Preceding the final departure from Galilee (Matt. 19. 1, 2), Jesus devoted himself primarily to teaching his disciples.

THE PEREAN MINISTRY

The lack of detailed information. Preceding the departure from Galilee there was an autumn journey to Jerusalem to the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7. 1-8, 59). John also records the presence of Jesus in Jerusalem at the Feast of Dedication (10. 22-42). Of the events of the intervening three months there is but scant information. It was probably about this time that the seventy were sent forth (Luke 10. 1-24). It is said that they were sent “two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself was about to come,” but we have no detailed account either of their journeyings or of Jesus going after them.

Teaching in Perea. We are indebted chiefly to Luke for our knowledge of Jesus’ ministry in Perea. Luke’s account (9. 51-18. 14) concerns itself chiefly with Jesus’ teaching. Among the few events recorded are the healing of a woman on the Sabbath (13. 20-21) and the healing of the ten lepers (17. 11-19). John’s account of the raising of Lazarus falls within this period (John 11. 1-46). Included in the teaching of this period are certain discourses, a number of parables, and also messages of warning addressed to the Pharisees.

The approach to Jerusalem. Throughout the Perean ministry Jesus' face was steadfastly set toward Jerusalem, although he well knew what would befall him there (Luke 9. 51). Luke's narrative bears evidence of the increasing opposition. Herod had formed a purpose to kill him (Luke 13. 31). The chief priests, Sadducees, joined hands with the Pharisees in plotting against him (John 11. 57). Approaching Jerusalem, at Bethany Jesus gratefully accepted from Mary an expression of self-sacrificing devotion as an anointing of his body for death.

THE PASSION WEEK

The triumphal entry. Hearing that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem, a great multitude went forth on the morning of the first day of the week to welcome him as the Messiah, the promised King. Purposely, Jesus planned to enter the city riding upon an ass as a public proclamation of Messiahship (Zech. 9. 9). That which he had long refrained from announcing he thus openly proclaimed. Now that he had by his deeds and his teachings made himself known, he thus offered himself to the people as the Christ. After going to the temple, receiving from his followers their joyful acclaim and from the children their songs of praise, Jesus quietly returned with the twelve to Bethany.

Conflict with the Jewish rulers. Tuesday brought open conflict with the Jewish rulers. The cleansing of the temple was again an assertion of royal authority. Because of the multitude of those who were friendly to Jesus the leaders dared not publicly attempt his arrest. They challenged his authority, strove to entangle him with questions, and controverted his teaching, but he easily proved himself superior to all of the forces that combined against him. Boldly he declared to Scribes, Pharisees, and priests that they were hypocrites who fought against God. Their enmity was only intensified and they went forth to plan secretly his destruction. Wednesday was apparently spent at Bethany in retirement with the disciples. On the evening of Thursday the Last Supper was celebrated. In connection with this sacred rite, Jesus spoke those farewell messages of instruction and consolation which have so richly comforted the sorrowing and oppressed of every age.

Arrest, trial and death. Late on Thursday night, through the perfidy of Judas, one of the twelve, Jesus was taken captive. He was delivered for trial, first to the Jewish Sanhedrin, then to Pilate, the Roman procurator of Judea. The charges against him were that he had blasphemed by claiming to be the Son of God and that he was a traitor to Rome because he had declared himself to be a king. Pilate inwardly desired to release Jesus, knowing that he was innocent of any wrong, but he was a coward and desired to appease the multitude. Weakly protesting, he delivered him to the mob, consenting to his death. With fearful haste the unrighteous sentence was executed. Ere the sun had set on Friday the tragedy of the ages had been enacted and the broken body of the Son of Man lay cold in death in the rock-hewn tomb of Joseph.

The Resurrection. On the morning of the first day of the week, devoted women, coming early to the tomb, found the stone rolled away and the sepulcher empty. Jesus had risen from the dead.

THE FORTY DAYS

The Appearance after the Resurrection. On several occasions and under a variety of circumstances Jesus appeared to his disciples during a period of forty days following the resurrection. Following the appearance to the women, Jesus appeared to two disciples on the way to Emmaus, to Simon, to the apostle on the evening of the day of resurrection, to Thomas with the other apostles, to seven disciples by the Sea of Galilee, to the eleven on a mountain in Galilee, and finally in Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives. Paul mentions an appearance of Jesus, and repeatedly refers to the risen Lord's appearance to himself. The appearances were seasons of brief fellowship in which Jesus sought to strengthen and spiritualize the faith of the disciples, to make clear that it behooved the Messiah to suffer and die, and to assure them of his continued presence with them in spirit.

The Ascension. Finally, from the summit of Olivet, after declaring that they should be his witnesses unto the uttermost parts of the earth, Jesus blessed his disciples and "was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight."

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. After your study of this chapter can you make an outline or chart of the life of Christ?
2. Has your own study in the Sunday school given you a vivid conception of Jesus' life and ministry? Explain your answer.
3. Which of the first three gospels means the most to you? Why?

LESSON III

THE FOURFOLD GOSPEL

The Christian gospel is one, but it is presented in fourfold form. It is the gospel according to Matthew, according to Mark, according to Luke, and according to John. As stated in our last chapter, none of the gospels are a biography of Jesus in the sense of supplying a complete history of his life. That there was a conscious omission of many particulars is shown by John's statement that he leaves unrecorded much more than he presents (John 21. 25). The common purpose of all four writers was so to present the good news that all might believe. Each doubtless had in mind a particular constituency for whom he wrote; each interpreted the common purpose in his own way and made use of facts concerning the life of Jesus, possessed in common with other apostles, in such a manner as to contribute to the realization of his particular purpose. Says Godet: "Matthew groups together the doctrinal teachings in the form of great discourses. He is the preacher. Mark narrates the events as they occur to his mind. He is the chronicler. Luke reproduces the external and internal development of events. He is the historian, properly so called. John gives the inmost spirit and meaning of the facts which he relates. He is the philosopher and divine." The result is that we have in the fourfold gospel a fuller and richer portrayal of the character and work of Jesus than would have been possible if the writers had purposed merely to furnish a written history of his life.

The first three gospels have more in common with one another than any one of them has with the fourth gospel. The resemblance between Matthew, Mark and Luke is such that they may be said to present a common view of the life of Christ. For this reason they are called the Synoptic Gospels.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MATTHEW

Distinctive purpose and characteristics. Matthew begins his gospel, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham." This indicates his purpose, namely, to demonstrate that Jesus is the true Messiah of the Jews. Most of the Jewish teachers and leaders had failed to see in Jesus the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy. Matthew undertakes to show that all prophecy is fulfilled in him. His characteristic statement is, "that it might be fulfilled." He has sixty-five quotations from the Old Testament, about three times as many as any other gospel writer. He gives little heed to chronological order of events in the life of Jesus, instead bringing together the material which he desires to use in a topical arrangement. He gives relatively more attention to the discourses of Jesus than do the other gospel writers, reporting five comparatively long discourses.

Outstanding contributions. Of all the gospels, Matthew most clearly presents Jesus as the Jewish Messiah, the consummate flower of the long course of Jewish religious development. Notwithstanding the fact that Jesus is a Hebrew of the Hebrews, he is shown to have boundless compassion upon outcasts and sinners, including both Jews and Gentiles. The warnings and rebukes addressed to the scribes and Pharisees give his teaching a note of authority and sternness heard in no other gospel. As the Messiah, Jesus is a king come to establish a kingdom. His kingdom, called by Matthew, alone, the kingdom of heaven, is not national but universal. It is freed of all Jewish limitations and into it as a world kingdom all nations shall be gathered.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK

Distinctive purpose and characteristics. "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." This opening sentence suggests that the author's intention is that of presenting a vivid word picture designed to show that Jesus is the Son of God. There is no argument and no apparent massing of evidence. The gospel is a plain, simple, direct, rapidly moving account of the public ministry of Jesus. The word "straightway" occurs more than forty times. The style is vivid, almost vivacious. Often the present tense prevails. There is no reference to the childhood or youth of Jesus. A few introductory sentences concerning John the Baptist lead to a matter of fact record of the baptism and temptation. This is followed immediately by the statement that Jesus came into Galilee preaching the gospel of God. The remainder of the book is concerned almost wholly with an account of the Galilean ministry and the events of Passion Week. The fact that there is no genealogy, almost no quotations from the Old Testament, and no emphasis upon the fulfillment of prophecy, together with the fact that an explanation is offered of certain Jewish customs, names and terms, strongly suggest that the author is writing especially for Gentiles. He appears to be confident that just as the life of Jesus impressed those who knew it best, so a realistic portrayal of the deeds of Jesus will carry conviction to the hearts of those who read. The supreme argument for the divinity of Jesus is not to be phrased in words; it is to be seen in his life.

Outstanding contributions. The gospel of Mark is the gospel of action. It might well be entitled, "The Deeds of Christ." Although many sayings and some discourses are presented, the deeds of Jesus constantly stand in the foreground. In it we have our most vivid, realistic picture of Jesus. Mark has a genius for exact description. In numerous instances he tells even Jesus' gestures or other bodily movements. (For example, see 7. 33, 34.) He supplies particulars of number, names, times, and place. The wealth of detail is such that although as a whole Mark's is the shortest of the gospels, not infrequently its account of events is longer than any of the parallel accounts. All the lines of the picture are clear cut and distinct, with a sharpness of impression which we find nowhere else. The power and strength of Jesus stand out in bold relief. One has suggested that the book might fittingly be called "the gospel of the strong Son of God." We gain also from Mark a realization of the impression which the words and deeds of Jesus made upon the people. Their "awe," "wonder," "fear," and "amazement" reflect the strength of Jesus' personality and the marvelous power manifest in his works.

THE GOSPEL OF LUKE

Distinctive purpose and characteristics. Luke states his purpose explicitly in his opening paragraph. (Read thoughtfully, 1. 1-4.) Many other narratives of the life of Jesus had been written. These have inspired him to write a historical, orderly account of the life of Jesus. He evidently did not think it necessary to the fulfillment of his purpose to write a complete biography. While it is addressed to an individual, Theophilus, it seems clear that the gospel is also intended for a wider circle, evidently Gentile Christians. The use of Hebrew is avoided and terms more intelligible to Gentiles replace Hebrew terms used in Matthew and Mark. Besides, there are a few distinctly Roman touches which occur nowhere else, for example, the name of the Roman emperor (3.1) and the taxing under Quirinius (2. 1).

Outstanding contributions. The lowly human origin of Jesus is shown in Luke's account of the nativity. Humble shepherds celebrate his birth and Joseph and Mary offer for him the sacrifice of the poor (2. 24). As a man, he knew poverty; he was without a home of his own and had not where to lay his head. To Luke we are indebted for our portrayal of Jesus as the Great Physician who healed both the souls and the bodies of men. Of the six miracles which he alone records, five are miracles of healing. Luke joins with Matthew in emphasizing Jesus' ministry to outcasts and sinners. He has compassion for all men, but his sympathy is especially extended to the unfortunate, to the poor, and to the weak. He loves and cares for little children. Women have a place of marked prominence in the narrative. The place of prayer in the life of our Lord is revealed in this gospel as in no other. Luke makes very prominent the human aspects of Jesus' life. The genealogy of the third chapter is traced back to Adam,—a declaration that Jesus is a member of the universal human family, and throughout the entire gospel his intimate fellowship with men is portrayed. But with equal clearness Luke asserts Jesus' divine character, calling him "Lord" more often than either Matthew or Mark. A remarkable summary of the distinctive features of Luke's gospel is given by Canon Farrar: "It is the gospel of the Greek and of the future; of catholicity of mind; . . . of the universality and gratuitousness of salvation; the gospel of holy toleration; the gospel of those whom the religious world calls heretics; the gospel of the publican, and the outcast, and the weeping Magdalene, and the crucified malefactor, and of the Good Samaritan, and of the prodigal son."

THE GOSPEL OF JOHN

Distinctive purpose and characteristics. John states his purpose explicitly (Read 20. 31). This purpose is never for a moment lost sight of. Says Dods: "No composition in the whole compass of literature is a more perfect unity. Each word has its own place and helps out the plan. There is not a wasted clause, nor one without significance from the first word to the last." His plan involves the presentation of both the words and deeds of Jesus. The miracles are "signs;" their object to aid men to believe. Numerous conversations and discourses are reported. Witnesses give their testimony, both for and against Christ. The style is less epigrammatic than in the other gospels and more discursive and argumentative. A few characteristic words are used many times. Among these are "believe," "know," "life," "light," "glory," and "witness." Of all the disciples, John, in all probability, knew Jesus most intimately, loved him the most, and understood him the best. This gave him ability to penetrate beyond the outward events of the life of Jesus and to discern their spiritual significance. Thus the church was bequeathed in the fourth gospel a spiritual inheritance of inestimable worth. Of all the gospels it can least be called a biography of Jesus, but it is nevertheless one of the books we could least afford to be without.

Outstanding contributions. As the gospel of love, John's gospel is dearer to the hearts of the devoted followers of Jesus than any other. As the highest and truest revelation of the spirit of Jesus ever written it has a charm and power that are all its own. It gives us a view of Jesus which we get nowhere else. It supplements and completes the revelation of Christ given in the other gospels in a truly wonderful way. Said Origen, one of the early church fathers: "This gospel is the consummation of the gospels as the gospels are of all the scriptures." In fulfilling his purpose, John presents Jesus in his divine character, as a manifestation of the Most High. His theme might be stated to be the manifestation of God in Christ. Whereas Mark begins his account with John the Baptist, and Matthew traces Jesus back to Abraham, and Luke to Adam, John goes back into pre-existent eternity, to God who was "in the beginning," with whom was the Divine Word. Manifested in the flesh he dwelt among us. In presenting an account of his life, John keeps us constantly in the presence of the Divine Christ. The necessity of believing, in order to apprehend the supreme revelation of Jesus, is strongly emphasized. Although, strange to say, the word faith is not once used, belief and unbelief, faith and doubt, are pictured growing side by side, unbelief finally culminating in the cry of the Jews at the trial before Pilate, "Away with him, away with him, crucify him;" and faith culminating in Thomas' confession, "My Lord and my God." While there are many remarkable omissions in John's narrative, there are several conversations and discourses of Jesus, of paramount importance, not reported elsewhere. We are indebted to John, for example, for the conversation with the woman of Samaria (4. 4-26); for the discourses on the bread of life (6. 22-71); for that on the light of the world (8. 12-30); for that part of the farewell discourse contained in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters, and for the intercessory prayer (17. 1-26).

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Note the emphasis which Matthew places upon the kingship of Jesus and upon his kingdom. See Matt. 2. 2 (Cf. Luke 2. 11); 4. 17 (Cf. Luke 4. 16-19); 22. 2-14 (Cf. Luke 14. 16-24); 27. 11, 37. Find other references.
2. Read Matthew, chapters 5 to 13, noting the topical arrangement: chapters 5 to 7, the Sermon on the Mount; 8 to 9, miracles;

10, instructions to the twelve; 11 to 12, rebuke and warning to the Jewish people, especially their religious leaders and teachers; 13, a group of parables spoken at various times.

3. Read Mark, chapters 1 to 8. As you read make a note of passages which show: (a) the writer's genius for exact description; (b) his interest in particulars; (c) the impression Jesus made upon the people.

4. Read Mark, chapters 9 to 16. When you have finished, write down the characteristics of Jesus which stand out most prominently in your mind as the result of your reading.

5. Recall the portrait of Jesus as drawn by Luke. What characteristics seem to you to be most prominent in Luke's portrait of Jesus?

6. Read two or three chapters of John's gospel, of your own choosing. Note any differences which occur to you between the writer's style, or form of writing and that (a) of Mark, (b) of Luke.

Make a list of the "I am's" of Jesus in John's gospel, for example, "I that speak unto thee am he," 4. 26; "I am the bread of life," 6. 35, etc.

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Of what advantage to a teacher might it be to have a clear understanding of the distinctive purpose of each of the gospels.

2. In what ways has the gospel of John been of value to your religious life?

3. Before reading chapter 4 make a list of some of the most prominent subjects of Jesus' teaching.

LESSON IV

THE FORM AND CONTENT OF JESUS' TEACHING

As many as fifty times in the brief records which compose the gospels Jesus is addressed as teacher. As a teacher he began his ministry (Luke 4. 16-27) and as a teacher he ended it (Luke 24. 44-49). While he is spoken of as having preached to the people, a study of the gospels will show that his preaching was invariably in the form of a teaching discourse. We speak of the Sermon on the Mount, but Matthew's record is, "And he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying . . ." (Matt. 5. 2). The evangelists refer to teaching as his regular custom; for example, Mark says, "As he was wont, he taught them" (Mark 10. 1), and John quotes him as saying, "I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple . . ." (John 18. 20).

Consider, also, the importance which Jesus attached to his teaching. Ponder the implications of John 15. 3; 6. 63; 8. 51; Matthew 8. 24-27. Remember that Jesus made keeping his words a test of our love for him (John 14. 23). Recall the encomium which Jesus passed upon Mary who "sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his words" (Luke 10. 39), declaring that she had chosen the good part which should not be taken away from her.

THE FORM OF JESUS' TEACHING

How did Jesus present his teaching? Could he be likened to a modern preacher preaching on subjects announced beforehand or to a professor teaching courses on given subjects? Did not practically all of Jesus' teaching grow out of actual situations in the lives of those whom he taught? Consider, for example, how he came to speak of the water of life and of worship in spirit to the woman of Samaria (John 4. 5-26). Was this not a typical incident in his teaching?

The teaching of Jesus was not presented in systematic form. There is very little in common between the form of Jesus' teaching and a modern volume of systematic theology. Jesus apparently made absolutely no effort to shape his teaching into a system of doctrine, nor can we properly speak of it as a body of doctrine. It grew out of life and it presents a way of life. Bishop McDowell, who speaks of Jesus as "the least academic and the most vital of all teachers," says: "His teaching is not a body of divinity, nor a code of rules for every emergency, nor a series of detached, unrelated sayings. It is a body of truth upon which life rests and out of which life grows; a set of principles which do not act as substitutes for thought, but which make thinking fruitful and not barren; . . . and all of the kind to which life in every age responds as true."¹

The clear, incisive, familiar, picturesque style of his teaching is to be especially noted. How simple, yet how pointed and impressive are many of his sayings! "Many are called but few are chosen" (Matt. 21. 14); "I came not to destroy but to fulfill" (Matt. 5. 17); "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted" (Luke 14. 11); "The sabbath was made for man and not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2. 27). There was nothing far-fetched or abstract about his teaching. It was close to life, full of pictures, pointed by references to the most common of objects.

Jesus was perfectly free and informal in his manner of teaching. "His method," says Stevens, "was strikingly simple, spontaneous and free." Sometimes he sat in the midst of a group of his disciples and talked with them; sometimes he stood while speaking. He taught in the synagogues and in the temple, on the mountain, while walking through the fields, and once, at least, when the people thronged him he entered into a boat and taught the people who stood or sat on the shore.

The outward form of Jesus' teaching varied with different occasions. Very much of his teaching was conversational. Recall how many of the priceless statements of truth which the world will never let die were spoken in informal conversation with one person. He seems to have preferred dealing at close range to addressing crowds. In these personal interviews he made much use of direct questioning. With wonderful tact and skill he drew from the one with whom he talked expressions of spiritual need, confession of moral shortcomings, the very truth he desired to apply and finally a profession of personal adherence. As a striking example study John 4. 5-42. In his conversation Jesus also made frequent use of brief, sententious sayings. In this respect his teaching bears resemblance to the Wisdom literature of the Old Testament, especially Proverbs. Examples may be found in Matt. 6. 21; 7. 1; 26. 41; Acts 20. 35.

The parable was a principal form of Jesus' teaching. By some students it has been styled the most characteristic form of his teaching. It was not a new form, for the writings of the rabbis abound with parables, but in the teaching of Jesus they attained their most significant use and their perfected form. Jesus' purpose in using parables he explained to his disciples. Consult Mark 4. 11-12; Matt. 13. 10-15; Luke 8. 9-10.

THE CONTENT OF JESUS' TEACHING

Is it possible to systematize and to summarize the teaching of Jesus? The form and characteristics of his teaching as we have briefly and imperfectly presented them must show how impossible such an undertaking is. Nor would it be desirable to do so, even if it were entirely possible. But it is wholly desirable to study the teaching of Jesus upon particular subjects. What were some of the principal subjects of Jesus' teaching?

The heavenly Father. In a few instances God is spoken of in the Old Testament as Father, but Jesus habitually called God by this name. The term, as he used it, had a meaning and content before unknown. "Jesus came," says Phillips Brooks, "to restore the fact of God's Fatherhood to man's knowledge and to its central place of power over man's life." The Father is a God of love, full of mercy and compassion for his children. This truth Jesus strongly emphasized, making it a central element in the gospel. God is the Father, not of one race, but of all men. His love and his fatherly care are extended not alone to the deserving, but to the unthankful and the wicked. He graciously forgives all who repent and accept the mediation of his Son. He hears the cry of the penitent, and answers all who call upon him. For his faithful and obedient children in the Gospel, he has reserved in Heaven an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled. Jesus spoke of God also as a King. He emphasized his majesty and his glory, and likewise his attributes of justice and perfect righteousness. God is the judge of all and his condemnation of evil doers and all workers of iniquity is stern and unsparing. Among other passages these will be found to be important. Matt. 5. 16, 43-48; 6. 1-18, 26-34; 7. 7-12; Luke 15; 18. 1-8; 12. 32.

The Kingdom of God. In beginning his ministry Jesus announced, "The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand," and so large a place did it have in his teaching that the evangelists describe his message as the "gospel of the kingdom." The kingdom, Jesus declared, is divine in origin. It is the rule of God in and through the hearts and lives of men. While it is an inner kingdom it has its outer aspects. It is a body of people who, because they have made the will of God supreme, possess certain qualities of mind and heart and live together as children of the Father and brothers in a family. It is a kingdom of love, of righteousness, and of right relations among men. It is not to be identified with any existing society or temporal rule. Neither nationality nor outward condition confers membership; its members are born of the Spirit. It is already present among men, but in the future it is to come with power. Though it may seem small and insignificant now, it will grow and increase until it fills the whole earth. Though it cometh not with observation it will ultimately transform human society. Consider, as among the principal references on the subject: Mark 1. 15; Matt. 5. 3-13; 7. 21; Luke 17. 20, 21; Matt. 20. 26, 27; Mark 4. 26-29; John 3. 1-8.

Of this kingdom Jesus proclaimed himself to be the Messiah, the promised King.

Man. Prominent in Jesus' teaching is his appreciation of the inherent worth of man. This finds expression both in his estimate of human nature and in his valuation of individual men. The soul is beyond all price, of so great value as not to be possible of measurement by material standards. The man farthest lost to righteousness is infinitely precious in the sight of God. The Son of man came to seek and to save the lost. No man is so far gone as to be irretrievably lost. In the worst of men the divine spark still burns. The supreme thing in life is to realize one's inheritance as a son through faith in Jesus Christ and to come into vital, filial relationship with the Father.

Jesus declared the sum of human duty to be expressed in the command to love God with the whole heart and one's neighbor as oneself. Love is the fulfilling of the law. Son-ship to God is to be realized in the life of love. By love Jesus meant not a passive virtue but, as Stevens says, "an energetic power which sets all the faculties of the soul in vigorous operation." The following passages are especially to be noted: Luke 9. 25; Matt. 10. 31; 12. 12; Luke 19. 1-10.

Sin. Jesus had little to say concerning sin in the abstract or concerning the origin of sin. But of the sins of men and of men as sinful and sinning, he had a great deal to say. He deals with sin concretely. He points to specific things and declares them wrong. He traces sins to their source in the will and in the evil heart. From within, out of the heart of men, sins proceed. The evil word, the wicked act, point within. Men will be justified or condemned because of what they are in their inner lives. Sins are punished both in this life and that which is to come. The punishment involves the loss of a glorious heritage and also positive suffering.

Certain sins are singled out for specific condemnation by Jesus. These are of three principal classes: Sins of the flesh and the sensual mind, as fornication, lasciviousness, adultery; sins growing out of an evil attitude toward other men such as thefts, covetousness, hatred, retaliation and resentment, refusal to forgive; sins connected with a wrong attitude toward truth and toward God, as untruthfulness, utterance of evil or empty words, refusal to accept the truth, hypocrisy, ingratitude, self-exaltation, blasphemy.

Jesus strenuously exhorted men to turn away from sin. He urged men to repent, an act which involves intellect, emotion, and will,—a change in the attitude of the heart, an abandonment of the evil purpose, turning the back on evil and setting the face toward the good. Study the following passages: Matt. 5. 21, 22, 27, 28; 7. 17-20; 12. 33-37; Mark 7. 20-23; 9. 43-48.

Deliverance. Jesus clearly stated the conditions of deliverance from sin. They are repentance, and faith in him and in God. Repentance brings forgiveness, faith is rewarded by the gift of life. If the sinner renounces and forsakes his sin, God forgives; that is, he reestablishes a filial relation, takes the repentant one into fellowship with himself. Faith, in the teaching of Jesus, like love, is not passive, but active. It manifests itself in conduct.

In the gospels a saving significance is attached to the entire ministry of Jesus. His words have a saving efficacy. "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life," he declared. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, if a man keep my sayings, he shall never see death" (John 8. 51). He invited men to receive him as Lord and Saviour. His example and influence, he, himself, would save men. "Come unto me . . . and ye shall find rest unto your souls" (Matt. 11. 28). Finally, a special meaning and value attached to his death. Sacrifice, he declared, was a fundamental law of the kingdom. Those who would be his disciples must be prepared to suffer for his sake. He, himself, was not exempt from this law. He could not be loyal to the truth he proclaimed, and to his mission as given him by the Father, and escape the cross.

In the presence of the cross we confront the mystery of the ages,—a mystery whose depth the human mind is unable to fathom. The types and figures by which theology seeks to explain it are all inadequate. From Jesus we learn that it was the Father's will that he should die thus; in his death we behold the innocent suffering for the guilty, we see God sharing the pangs of a world in travail. Moreover, he assures us that through his death men are to be saved; his blood is shed for us; it is the blood of a new covenant, shed for many unto the remission of sins. Among other references, these should be thoughtfully studied: Mark 1. 17; 2.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

(Numerous references for a study of the form and content of Jesus' teaching are given above. The following suggestions are concerned with a study of the method of Jesus as a teacher.)

1. Note how Jesus made use of a common, apparently casual circumstance as a starting point to lead a soul into the truth and into right relations with God. John 4. 5-26.

2. Note how Jesus used Scripture in repelling temptation, Matt. 4. 1-11. Find examples showing his use of Scripture in teaching.

3. Compare the Beatitudes (Matt. 5. 3-12), as to form, with the Decalogue (Exod. 20. 1-17). What is the difference? Was Jesus' teaching usually positive or negative in form? Do you find any examples of the negative form?

4. Note the appeal of Jesus to the will, as in Luke 9. 23. Find other examples. Would you say that he placed primary emphasis upon understanding, or upon feeling, or upon doing?

5. Study Jesus' use of questions in teaching. As a typical example take Luke 10. 25-37. Note how through skillful questioning he leads the lawyer to answer his own question.

6. Consider Jesus' use of the concrete in teaching, for example, Matt. 18. 1-3. To what extent may this be said to be typical of Jesus' method of teaching?

7. What instances can you find of Jesus making use of personal interviews in teaching? Did he do this frequently?

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Would you say that Jesus was "a great scholar"? Why, then, is he known as the Master Teacher?

2. Compare Jesus as a teacher with any great modern teacher. For example, a modern teacher is connected with a school or college; Jesus was connected with no school, etc.

3. What do you think is the central element in the Christian religion?

LESSON V

THE PERSONALITY OF JESUS

In our last lesson we thought of Christ in terms of his work as a teacher. Since of all teachers Jesus is easily first, his teaching is of paramount importance. But the factor of greatest importance in any study of Christ is not his teaching but himself. His character and personality were more than his spoken words. The partial record of his sayings furnished by the evangelists is a priceless contribution. In itself it makes the world their debtor for all time. But the gospel contained in the New Testament is above all else the gospel of a divine Person. Its supreme contribution to religion is the personality of the historical Jesus. The revelation of God to the world could not be made in words alone; for its complete expression, one that would make clear its nature, its purpose, and its full significance, a personality was required. The supreme revelation of God to the world is in the person of Jesus Christ.

THE DEFINITION OF HIS PERSONALITY

How shall we define the personality of Christ? The terms we use in speaking of him,—Christ, the Son of God, the son of man, the Saviour—are attempts at definition. The early church used still other names and descriptive phrases in speaking of him. They said he was the express image of God's person, the uttered reason of God, the outshining of the divine majesty, very God of very God. Originally each of these terms was an attempt of some disciple to express in words what Jesus had come to mean to him in his personal experience. No one of these terms in itself, nor all of them taken together are sufficient to express the full significance of Jesus. He transcends by far all attempts at definition; his character surpasses all estimate. How then can anyone estimate the personality of Jesus for another?

How did the disciples come to their estimate of Jesus? Was it given to them in the words of another or did it come to them as a revelation,—a process of discovery as they lived with him? Before attempting to answer this question meditate on Matt. 16. 13-17. Must not every really vital estimate of Jesus come chiefly in this way? Says Charles E. Jefferson, "There are some things that cannot be told. I cannot tell a man beauty; a man must see beauty for himself. I cannot tell a man music; he must hear it for himself. I cannot tell a man love; he must love before he knows what love is. Neither can I tell any man the deity of Jesus. Every man must find that out for himself."¹

What is here set forth in brief, simple statement is designed only to give suggestive aid in that which must be chiefly a discovery that will come from loving, loyal, open minded discipleship.

Among the things which it is important to take into account are:

The unique filial relationship of Jesus to God. This is implied in his acceptance of the title of Messiah and in the many passages in which he refers to God as "my Father" (for example, Matt. 7. 21). It is directly asserted in the application to himself of the titles, the Son (Luke 10. 22; Mark 13. 32) and the Son of God (John 5. 25; 10. 36; 11. 4), and in those statements which declare his oneness with God (John 10. 30; 17. 21). As we study the gospels we are impelled to the conclusion that Jesus possessed a consciousness of perfect union with God, of ability to reveal God to men and to accurately portray to men the character of God.

The unique moral consciousness of Jesus. He asserts a consciousness of unbroken moral fellowship with God. Read, as one statement of this, John 8. 29. In its negative aspect, this means that Jesus was without sin, but it signifies vastly more than this; nothing less, in fact, than that in Jesus the perfect, ideal moral character is to be seen. Contemplating his character, men of every generation have been led to exclaim with Renan, "Whatever the surprises of history, Jesus will never be surpassed."

Jesus' consciousness of pre-eminent authority. He had the attestation of no human institution, possessed credentials from neither church nor state, yet he asserted a degree of authority such as no man had ever claimed before—authority to annul the sacred law of the Jews (Mark 2. 23-28; Matt. 5. 31, 32, 38, 39); to forgive sins, an authority which he vindicated by his deeds of power (Mark 2. 5-12); and to execute divine judgment (John 5. 22-27). "Authority," says a recent writer, "is bound up with personality and is a vital expression of it." The authority of Jesus stands this test. It was not something external, but was rather in and of himself. In this connection consider the significance of the statement in Matt. 7. 28, 29.

Jesus' possession of unique power. Evidence of this appears on almost every page of the gospels. On many occasions he exercised a control over the forces of nature and a power to heal and restore body and mind such as caused those who beheld to acclaim his acts as "signs" and "wonders." The miracles of Jesus, without question, had an important place in attesting his divine power and authority to the men of his own day. As Myers has said, "If the gospel signs and wonders are considered as indications of laws which embrace, and in a sense unite, the seen and the

unseen worlds, then surely it is of immense importance to science that they should occur anywhere, and of immense importance to Christianity that they should occur in connection with the foundation of that faith." ¹

The final transcendent evidence of the unique power of Jesus was afforded when his personality showed itself mightier than death. To Paul, this crowning miracle of Jesus' earthly career was the cornerstone of the Christian faith (Corinthians 15. 14). For us, as for him, by his resurrection Jesus brought life and immortality to light.

CHRISTIANITY A PERSONAL RELIGION

What were some of the invitations of Jesus in calling men to discipleship? Read Luke 5. 27; John 1, 43; Matt. 11. 28-30. Can you give other examples? Note that these invitations are in personal terms.

Jesus is a living Saviour, a reigning Lord. The recorded utterances of Jesus come to us out of the past, but Jesus himself lives and reigns in the hearts of men as Lord and Saviour. He is a living presence, an influence, an inspiration, a power, in the lives of countless men of our own day. He enters into our human lives in such intimate relations that such a man as Horace Bushnell is enabled to say, "I know Jesus Christ better, far better, than I know any man in Hartford."

The living Christ gives power to the written word. "It is the living Christ who keeps the doctrine of Christ a living doctrine, his truth a living truth. 'The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life,' but they are spirit and life not alone because they are correct words but also because he is evermore in them." ² after nineteen centuries we still repeat the invitation he gave: "Follow me," "Come unto me," "Believe on me." We recognize that the central element in Christianity is a personal relation between the disciple and Christ. The study of the teaching of Jesus apart from personal relationship to Jesus may be illuminating and inspiring, but it is not life-giving. We may indeed receive into our minds as information all that the gospels contain and be but little better off either morally or religiously. It is when our hearts open to the influence of Christ and our wills are conformed to his will that his words become dynamic, a savor of life unto life.

THE TEACHER'S PROBLEM

What was the supreme element in Jesus' training of the Twelve? What was the greatest thing he did for them? Read Mark 3. 13, 14, and endeavor to answer these questions in the light of this statement. Consider especially the significance of the words, "And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him . . ."

In all teaching the supreme force is personality. More potent by far than words is the power of a great personality. The richest personality ever in the world is that of Jesus Christ. In view of this, what is the chief problem of the teacher of religion? It is surely this: how to bring the pupil into contact with Christ, how to bring the personality of Christ to bear upon the pupil. How can we cause it to be brought about that our pupils of all ages shall see him, and come to know him, and that his personality may so make its impression upon their minds and hearts that Christ shall be formed in them? For this is our chief concern for them, as Bushnell says, that they shall be "Christed all through, filled in every fiber and member with the Christly manifestation, in that manner to be so interwoven with him as to cross fiber and to feel throughout the quickening contact of his personality."

The problem of how this can be most effectively accomplished is that with which our remaining lessons will deal. It is a problem which must be considered in the light of the dominant interests and needs of the successive periods of the life of the pupil. To the extent that we succeed in our effort to find a right solution we shall blaze a clear path for the Christian nurture of our pupils.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

(In connection with the study of the personality of Jesus as presented in this chapter, we suggest the consideration of some chief aspects of his character.)

1. Consider the love of Jesus. Meditate on these passages: John 15. 9-15; 13. 1-5; Luke 22. 14, 15; John 13. 23, 31, 35.

2. Consider the magnanimity of Jesus. Among other passages think of these: Mark 2. 15-17; John 4. 5-10; Matt. 26. 50; Luke 23. 33, 34.

3. Consider the indignation of Jesus. Ponder these statements: Matt. 23. 23-38; Mark 8. 31-33; John 2. 13-17.

4. Consider the prayerfulness of Jesus. Meditate on these passages: Mark 1. 32-35; 6. 45, 46; Luke 6. 12; 9. 28, 29; Mark 14. 32-36.

5. Consider the joy of Jesus. Think on these verses: John 15. 11; 17. 13; 16. 33; Matt. 9. 10-15; 25. 21-23.

6. Consider the sublime confidence of Jesus as indicated in these verses: Matt. 13. 31-33; Mark 14. 9; 14. 22-25.

7. Consider the loyalty of Jesus to the Father's will. Study these passages: Matt. 12. 47; Luke 22. 39-44; John 4. 31-34; 5. 30; 6. 38.

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Have you as a teacher so studied the gospels as to allow the personality of Jesus to make its full impression upon your mind and heart?

2. Have you fully considered how important it is that your personality as a teacher should reflect the personality of Jesus?

3. Before studying chapter 6, ask yourself why the gospels should be used in teaching little children.

LESSON VI

LITTLE CHILDREN AND THE LIFE OF CHRIST

Why should we use the gospels in teaching little children? Can we assume that they are valuable for little children because as adults we have found them of supreme worth? In the days when children were commonly thought of as diminutive men and women such an assumption might have passed unchallenged, but not so today. We now clearly understand that the religious needs of little children are very different from those of mature men and women. We also know that it is quite as impossible to compel a child's mind to learn what is unsuited to his capacity as to compel his physical system to assimilate unsuitable food. For these reasons we may not pass from a study of the gospels to their use as the source of lessons for pupils of all grades. We must be sure that we understand the needs of pupils of each age and then we must reexamine the gospels in the light of these needs.

LESSONS FOR LITTLE CHILDREN

The characteristics and needs of Beginners and Primary children have been studied. Are the most important of these needs clearly before our minds? What are some of them? What requirements concerning lessons grow out of the religious needs of children in these periods? Let us call to mind some elementary principles.

The lesson should be presented in story form. For both the Beginner and the Primary pupil it holds absolutely that

"Truth in closest words shall fail
Where truth embodied in a tale
Shall enter in at lowly doors."

The truth which the story presents should be within the range of the child's understanding. His range of understanding of abstract ideas is very limited. Most of the theological ideas cherished by adults are entirely meaningless to the little child. Weaving them into a story does not help in the least in making them understandable. Since a primary purpose of the story is the message which it carries to the mind and heart, it is not enough to present the lesson in story form; the content of the story must be suitable for the mind of the child.

The situation which the story presents should be within the range of the child's experience. The situation pictured should be within the little child's world. It should be such a situation as he can fit himself into and it should offer something that he can take to himself, and make a part of his own life. If it is to help him, he must be able to live the story over again as he thinks of it.

The story should be told in such a way as to awaken a response. Even less with little children than with adults can we assume that mere telling is teaching. The response of the child determines the value of the story and there is no other test. A teacher of whom Miss Danielson tells had satisfying evidence that her use of the story "Jesus Loving Little Children" was effective. In closing the story she said, "We cannot put our arms about Jesus' neck or feel his hand upon our heads, as those long ago children did, but we can speak to him and we will now." At that moment a little girl suggested softly, "We might make believe put our arms round his neck while we do."

Stories should be arranged in topical order. Little children have no measure of time and very little realization of orderly sequence of events. A chronological order has therefore no significance for them. Because they desire to hear the same story over and over, and because a truth must be repeatedly expressed if it is to make a permanent impression, there is particular significance in the arrangement of stories under general topics, and it is important that this order should be followed.

THE SPECIAL ADAPTABILITY OF STORIES FROM THE LIFE OF CHRIST

Having ascertained some of the elemental requirements concerning the form of the lesson and the manner of its presentation we are now ready to consider its content. But we are not to think of all possible lesson material. Our problem is less general since we limit ourselves in this course to a study of the life of Christ. How do stories from the life of Christ help the little child to live his life aright? What needs of little children are they adapted in an especial way to satisfy?

Stories from the gospels give little children right ideas of God. Our study of Beginners and Primary children doubtless impressed us with their need to know of the love, protecting care, and benevolent power of God. The idea of God is not strange or alien to the mind of the child. But have you never noticed that the little child's thought of God often is grotesque? Can you give examples of crude ideas of God expressed by little children? How can we aid little children in getting right ideas of God? Will it mean anything to them to tell them that God is a Spirit? Is a little child capable of conceiving of God as a Spirit? As the little child must think of God in terms of a human being is it not highly important that we should lead him to have right conceptions of the nature and being of God by telling him stories of Jesus, the Son of God? Our highest and truest conceptions of the nature and purposes of God come from the life and teaching of Jesus. From the same source we secure lessons best adapted to meet this need of little children. We want the little child to think of God as Father and of himself as God's child. Stories of the Child Jesus, God's Son, meet this need as no other stories can possibly meet it.

Stories which tell of the love of Jesus awaken an answering love in the little child's heart. Never will the human being be more responsive to love than during these years. If we may succeed in interpreting the love of God to the heart of the little child we may be perfectly sure that he will respond and that an answering love will spring up in his own soul. How can we best interpret the love of God to the little child? This is a question which as teachers of little children we are called upon to ponder. It must be very evident that we cannot do it by any process of reasoning. Perhaps we will be helped in answering the question by asking how we assure our own hearts of the love of God when dark doubts of God's providence crowd in upon us. Do we not invariably fall back upon the assurance which comes from the life of Jesus Christ? "God is like Christ," we say, "and Christ loved men. He showed his love in ways we cannot dispute. We cannot possibly stand against the evidence which comes to us from his life." Jesus' deeds of compassion and love are as plain in their meaning to little children as to adults. So in teaching them we may tell them about Jesus. We may give them stories showing his love. Then we may say, "Jesus was God's Son. God is like Jesus. God the Father loves us even as Jesus loves us." To this the heart of the child will respond, "I love God. He is my Father, too, isn't he?"

Stories of the protecting care of Jesus help to satisfy the child's hunger for protection and awaken the feeling of trust and their desire to be helpful. The child's dependence causes his whole nature to cry out for care and protection. His response to the one who provides for this need is immediate and lasting. Stories which tell of the power of Jesus to give care and protection cannot fail to awaken a feeling of trust in the heart of the little child and thus the foundation for a life of Christian faith is laid. Appreciation of care is naturally accompanied by the feeling of gratitude and this may be nurtured through encouragement to expression in songs, words and deeds. Other stories which tell of the gratitude of those for whom Jesus cared will aid such expression. Stories should also be told which show how people and, as far as possible, little children helped Jesus in giving care. The suggestion that they themselves can be of help to Jesus will come naturally to the children to whom the stories are told, and if opportunities be offered they will readily learn ways of helpfulness.

Stories from the gospels inculcate moral ideals such as little children need. How shall we teach the little child to be kind? In what way can the little child be taught obedience? In what way can ideals of right conduct be most effectively presented to him? If the little child is told of a child who was kind, or of a man whom he loves who did a kind deed to someone in need, his certain impulse will be to do a similar act of kindness. Some of the happiest experiences of Beginners' teachers have come when in the use of the Beginners' Graded Lessons the story of Jesus Caring for a Sick Boy, or that of Jesus Helping the Blind Man, has been told and some little boy or girl previously unresponsive has said: "James is sick. Can't we do something for him?" Or "I know a blind man who lives on our street. I would like to do something for him." It is such experiences as these which prove to the Beginners' or Primary teacher that she is really teaching. An abundance of material for teaching moral ideals is to be found in the gospels.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST FOR CHILDREN

Should an attempt be made to present the whole story of the life of Christ to little children? Our discussion has concerned selected stories from the gospels. Should something more be offered? Many persons have written lives of Christ for children, attempting to present the entire contents of the gospels. What shall be said concerning these?

All of the contents of the gospels are not for children. It is to be recognized that the gospels were addressed to adults and much of the material in them can be effectively used only in teaching seniors and adults. Advanced theological ideas are of no present value to a little child. They are entirely without the range of the little child's understanding. It avails nothing to take an abstract theological idea expressed in difficult terms and state it in words of one syllable. The words of a book are not eaten by the child. The entire situation must be within the range of his experience if it is to be seized upon and utilized by his mind. The idea must be such as will kindle imagination, appeal to feeling, and instruct the intellect. If the ideas expressed mean nothing to his mind the fact that they are clothed in simple words will not aid in the least.

Chronological order is of no significance to a little child. "Yesterday" and "tomorrow" are alike to him. He does not remember the order in which events occur. Chronological arrangement is, therefore, for the little child arbitrary and meaningless.

For these reasons we are not to try to teach the life of Christ as such to little children. That will come later. For pupils of Beginners' and Primary age we will select general topics or themes under each of which may be grouped a number of stories teaching the same or similar truths. The basis of selection in every case will be the needs of the children for whom the stories are selected.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Read Luke 2. 1-20, 22-39. Think of these passages as two stories to be told to little children. What purposes would these fulfill in their lives?

2. Study the incident recorded in Mark 10. 13-16. Write or tell the story as you would tell it to a group of Beginners. Compare Story 23, International Graded Lessons, Beginners' Series, First Year. Would this story tend to awaken love for Jesus in the heart of a little child?

3. Read Matt. 21. 6-11, 14-16. Do you see in the description of the children's praise the suggestion of a story of their love for Jesus and their desire to do something for him? What response would you expect from little children?

4. Read Mark 4. 35-41. How would you tell the story of this incident in order to emphasize the protecting care of Jesus? What service would this render to the little child?

5. Read Mark 10. 46-52. Read the story as it is told in Lesson 18, International Graded Lessons, Primary Series, Second Year. Do you think this story is fitted to realize the aim for which it is told?

6. Consider how you would tell the story of the incident related in Matt. 14. 15-21 to a class of primary children. What would be your purpose in telling the story?

7. Study Luke 17. 11-19 as a story to be told to primary children. With what different purposes could this story be told?

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Do the gospels have as large a place as should be given to them in teaching little children?

2. Can you recall your childhood's Sunday school experience? In what ways were you helped most by stories from the life of Christ?

3. What are some of the principal needs of Juniors which may be met by lessons?

LESSON VII

JUNIORS AND THE LIFE OF CHRIST

We now come to consider the life of Christ in the light of the religious needs of children of nine to eleven or twelve. Our problem demands of us an acquaintance with children of this age. How well do we know Junior boys and girls? To what extent are their interests familiar to us? Can we state the principal religious needs of Juniors which we may hope to supply by means of instruction? What kind of lessons will most effectively meet these needs?

Our present task is not to review all possible lesson material, but rather to consider the special adaptability of the life of Christ.

THE SPECIAL ADAPTABILITY OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST

In what ways is the life of Christ especially adapted to meet the needs of Juniors?

The life of Christ is a record of heroic action. Jesus lived an intensely active life. We may well question whether another life has ever been lived into which so much and such varied action was crowded in so brief a space of time. And in it all the element of moral heroism was predominant. On every page of the gospels there is action of such moral quality that neither comment nor interpretation is needed to make it evident. The action appeals to the interests of Juniors and the moral values implicit in the deeds of Jesus make deeper impression upon them than any amount of abstract teaching.

The life of Christ represents personified power. There is no limit to the power of Jesus as his life and work are portrayed in the gospels. The forces of nature do his bidding. The winds and the waves obey him; at his word the storm becomes a calm; he heals the sick and causes the dead to live. To him there are no impossible tasks. His power is beyond the comprehension of the wisest. Men and women of his own day were astonished beyond measure at its manifestations; men of all time have marveled at it; the minds of boys and girls of Junior age are filled with wonder by it. They are always impressed by manifestations of power. Before the limitless power of Jesus they bow in reverent awe and worship.

Jesus represents in himself an authority which appeals to the Junior. The recognition of the authority of Jesus stands out prominently upon the pages of the gospels. Men see in him an authority such as appears in no one else. It is not an authority which announced itself or which needs external means for its enforcement. It is an authority which inheres in power and truth and nobility of character. While it is seen in some measure in other men its supreme manifestation is in the divine man, Jesus Christ. This authority the Junior instinctively realizes. It appeals to him and he readily bows down to it.

The obedience of Jesus to his Father's will is an example of the highest value to the Junior. A supreme element in the life of Jesus was his purpose to do the Father's will. Again and again this appears as a determining factor in a course of action. He not merely consented to do the Father's will, he was eager to do it, and he did it when the cost was sacrifice, pain, death. This is of utmost significance in teaching Juniors. These are the years in which obedience must be finally learned. Just ahead dawn the new years of independence, individual freedom, and personal initiative. An example of obedience, and even more, a life story which places the stamp of heroism upon obedience is invaluable in its influence upon the child of this age.

The life of Christ offers to the Junior a leader whom he may follow. The gospel picture reveals Jesus as a leader. Men willingly and readily followed him. He was at the head of a group or band of disciples who went with him, heeded his words, did his bidding. This picture impresses the Junior. When he learns that Jesus is to-day a living leader, and that he invites all who will to follow him, he too is ready to hear and heed.

The moral and religious example of Jesus is of the largest value to Juniors. The special moral problems of this period have chiefly to do with the building up of right habits and the development of right attitudes. What are some habits Juniors should form? One of the most important, it will be agreed, is the habit of prayer. How can this habit be established? The example of Jesus will be found to be a potent influence here. What can Junior boys and girls do in the way of service to others? How can they be stimulated to do these things? In this also the example of Jesus will be found to be exceedingly influential.

FORM OF PRESENTATION

Our study of the gospels has acquainted us with the purpose of each of the evangelists. No one of them, it will be agreed, wrote especially for children of Junior age. In what form, then, shall the life of Christ be presented to Juniors?

The form to be desired is one that will vividly present a concrete picture of Jesus himself. The Greeks came to Philip saying, "Sir, we would see Jesus." So the Junior comes to the Sunday school with the need of being made acquainted with Jesus. As a little child, with a child's limitations, he could have only childish ideas of Jesus. Now, growth has made it possible for him to become acquainted with Jesus, the man, as he lived and wrought on earth, and it is the obligation of the Sunday school to bring him near and make him real. He needs, literally, to see Jesus, to see the manner of his life, to see his works and his conduct under the various circumstances portrayed in the gospel accounts. The conversation and statements of adults concerning the divinity of Jesus not infrequently cause children to think of him as an unnatural being, wholly unlike men, and these childish conceptions are a fruitful source of later unbelief. It is important that during these years the child shall be led to an acquaintance with the man Jesus of the historical records.

The narrative must move rapidly, presenting in quick succession deeds and mighty acts which manifest the power of Christ. It is Jesus as the doer of deeds of power and might in whom the Junior will be most interested and by whom he will be most impressed. It is not yet time for character analysis. That will come later. It is not necessary to define the moral quality of specific acts, nor is it desirable that the label of hero be attached. If the narrative presents the deeds of Jesus vividly and concretely his personality may be trusted to make its own impression. The Junior will come spontaneously to recognize the moral quality of the life as a whole and to realize that Jesus is come from God, for no man could do these mighty works that Jesus does "except God be with him." Having reached their own decisions concerning him these boys and girls may be depended upon to hold to them against the world.

Christ is to be presented as Lord and Saviour. The Junior recognizes authority without protest. In early childhood, when action is principally imitation, obedience is to be gained by indirection; in these years obedience to Christ as Lord and King may be gained by recognition of his right to rule. The authority of Christ will be a natural inference made by the Junior himself as he sees his mighty works.

The child reared in a Christian environment is likely to come, and as we believe normally comes so gradually into a filial attitude toward God as Father and Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour that the process is an unconscious one. But at about this time, when the realization of the power to choose for oneself first comes, the child is for the first time in his life really capable of choosing, by a conscious, definite act of will to accept Jesus as his Lord and Saviour. This new possibility, together with the quickening of religious interest which also comes naturally at this time, presents a unique spiritual opportunity which every earnest teacher should recognize.

For the most part, lesson material should be in the form of stories of action. Sermons, moralizing and abstract discussions will have little effect with Juniors, for the abstract holds no interest for them. Stories are interesting to them and if the stories present a moral situation the pupils may be trusted to see its significance and construct its parallel for their own lives. We only bore them if we attempt to make an application for them. This is a difficult lesson for inexperienced teachers to learn, but it is an important one.

Let us emphasize the fact that in teaching Juniors the life situation, that is, the thing that happened, is the lesson. The idea that every verse of scripture is intended to teach some important moral truth has been so firmly fixed in the popular mind that it is very difficult for the Sunday school teacher to resist the temptation to stop after every verse quoted from the Bible to ask, "Now what does this teach us?" Such a process is tantalizing to the Junior. He does not care what the verse teaches. He wants to know what happened next. We must depend for our lesson upon the impression of the whole upon his mind. The time will come, if we succeed in interesting him now, when he will be ready for lesson analysis, but that time is not yet.

In some of the parables of Jesus we have teaching material in story form well adapted to Juniors. Thoughtful discrimination must be exercised in choice, for in not a few of Jesus' parables the situation pictured is entirely beyond the range of the Junior's experience. In these cases it is better for the parables to be reserved for later use, but some of the parables, which present situations which have a parallel in the experience of boys and girls of Junior age, awaken a keen interest. Compare the parable of the two foundations (Matt. 7. 16-29) and the parable of the unjust steward (Luke 16. 1-13). Which of these is the more suitable for Juniors? Compare also the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10. 30-37) and the parable of the unrighteous judge (Luke 18. 1-8). Which of these would you use in teaching Juniors?

Where can such lessons be found? What does our study of the gospels suggest concerning possible sources for such lesson material as we have described? As between the synoptic gospels and the gospel of John, which has the larger amount of material adapted to Juniors? Of the synoptic gospels that of Mark is best adapted for teaching the life of Christ to children of this age. Its graphic quality, its rapidity of movement, its emphasis upon deeds rather than teachings, its vivid portrayal of the might and power of Jesus, are ideal qualities in lesson material for Juniors.

OTHER IMPORTANT REQUIREMENTS

What requirements as to lessons, other than those we have considered which have to do with form of presentation, are made by Junior interests and needs?

Events should be presented in chronological order. In this period it is for the first time possible to give to the child a conception of the order of events in the life of Christ. His growing realization of time sequence makes it desirable to do this. He is interested in knowing the order in which events occurred. This also helps him to organize his knowledge and interpret it. He should be given an accurate conception of the course of the life and public work of Jesus. We should do for him what W. L. Hervey in Picture Work criticizes the Uniform Lessons for failing to do. He says, "Our course through the Bible—incident by incident, verse by verse, here a little, there a little, years of 'lessons,' but no idea even of the life of Christ as a whole—is not unlike the toilsome road traversed by the boy 'reading' Caesar as his first Latin author: so many separate, mutually repellent parts, but no wholes, no idea of what it is all about; or it may be compared to the route of the milkman—a stop at every other house, and never a good run."

Emphasis should be placed upon memorization. What has been said of these years as the memory period? The fact that repetition now will fix anything in mind gives added importance to memorization. First of all, material of immediate use in the life of the child should be memorized. The outline of the life of Christ also should be memorized, as well as all of the most important events of his life. Facts of value in understanding his life and interpreting his teaching likewise should be fixed in mind.

The background of the life of Christ should now be filled in by a study of the physical geography of the land of Palestine. During the early Junior years the child comes into possession of a sense of location which makes it possible for him to place the land of Palestine with some accuracy as related to other lands and the world as a whole.

A knowledge of the physical features of Palestine will enable the Junior to visualize the events of Jesus' life with an accuracy that will be of much value to him. Now is the time for the making of outline maps. With but little difficulty the outline of the land of Palestine, with its principal divisions, its outstanding physical characteristics, and its chief places, can be fixed permanently in mind.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Study Luke 2. 40-52. Try to put yourself in the place of a boy of ten and ask what values there would be in this statement for you.

2. Read Matt. 14. 13-33 as an account of a busy day in the life of Jesus. Is there action here of a kind, variety, and extent to appeal to the interest of Juniors?

3. Read Mark 2. 1-12. Is there an authority manifested here which would appeal to a Junior? Can you find other examples?

4. Read Luke 10. 25-37. Does this seem to you to be a story that would be of interest to Juniors? What lesson is in it for them?

5. Read Matt. 7. 16-20. Is this good lesson material for children of Junior age? Shape a statement of your aim in teaching it. Compare your statement with that given in Lesson 44, International Graded Lessons, Junior Series, First Year.

6. Read John 4. 31-34. Would these words impress a Junior? Was this spirit of obedience to the Father's will dominant in Jesus' life? Find other examples of it.

7. Consider Mark 1. 32-35; Luke 6. 12. If Jesus' practice of prayer is held up frequently before Juniors, will it aid them in forming the habit of prayer?

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Are boys and girls of Junior age commonly as familiar with the life of Christ as of the lives of heroes of whom they read and study in day school?

2. Is the life of Christ commonly given the place it should have in the religious instruction of Juniors?

3. What aspects of the life and character of Jesus are peculiarly fitted to interest and benefit Intermediates?

LESSON VIII

TEACHING THE LIFE OF CHRIST TO INTERMEDIATES

How do boys and girls in their early 'teens differ from those nine to eleven years of age? What are their peculiar problems, their difficulties, and their temptations? What decisions have they to make which will have an important bearing upon their mature characters and upon their life courses?

What kinds of books appeal most strongly to Intermediates? Where will they find pictured the ideals, motives and purposes which will be of most help in shaping an inner life structure which will express itself in wise, noble, unselfish choices? Recall your own early youth. What books did you most enjoy during these years? What books are most popular among the high school pupils of your community? Answers to these questions will indicate that while the reading interests of individual pupils vary widely, and that while several types of literature are popular with Intermediates considered collectively, biography in the form of narrative has a very strong appeal to most boys and girls during these years.

THE SERVICE OF BIOGRAPHY TO INTERMEDIATES

Certain qualities inhering in biography constitute it the type of lesson material preeminently serviceable in the religious education of Intermediates. Let us consider these qualities briefly.

Biography is history written in terms of personal life. The kind of history which is a bare chronicle of facts supplies information to the intellect, but has no power to kindle the soul. Biography acquaints us with persons and because of this kindles the emotions. If the story is of a man or woman who has accomplished a really great work, or who has succeeded against obstacles in carrying out a difficult purpose, its influence upon the soul often is strong and abiding.

Biography concerns itself with the springs of action. It lays bare the inner life. It chronicles events, but it records them not alone for their own sake but for the sake of the light they shed on the underlying motives and purposes. In this way it opens up the inner life which, to the pupil of fifteen and sixteen especially, is the subject of so much thought and interest.

Biography supplies the companionship and friendship of great souls. Idealism has its rise in these years. The dreaming and yearning so characteristic of both boy and girl at this time mean aspirations and lofty desires. The Intermediate is often depressed by his commonplace surroundings and the pettiness and irritability exhibited by those whom he knows best. He longs for fellowship and friendship which are satisfying and inspiring and these are supplied by biography which makes him acquainted with great souls and gives him the privilege of association with the noble and the heroic.

WHY THE LIFE OF JESUS IS OF SUPREME VALUE

Is all biography equally serviceable for the purposes of religious education? Are there reasons why the biography of Jesus is of supreme value? What reasons can you state?

Among the moral heroes of the race Jesus stands supreme. In the purity of his motives, in the unselfish quality of his purposes, in the divinity of his ideals, in the righteousness of all his acts, Jesus towers high above other men.

He is preeminent in the realm of moral character. Of all men, his character alone reveals no flaw, no lack, no defect. Whereas the Junior worships the hero of action, and the Intermediate likewise admires achievement, the latter often is more strongly impressed with the moral strength of Jesus than with his great deeds.

Jesus is the universal hero. Other men whom we recognize as heroes are more or less disqualified by limitations of race, of nation, of tongue. But not so with Jesus. People of every nation, of every race, gladly recognized in him the highest type of manhood. Thus he appeals to all young people, everywhere, whom the Sunday school is called upon to teach. He is the one great world figure in the study of whose biography all may unite in perfect accord.

Jesus met and overcame the typical temptations of youth. The temptations which the gospels describe as having confronted Jesus at the beginning of his public ministry are those which always young life has to meet. In essence the three great temptations were to use his divine power (1) selfishly, for his own aggrandizement; (2) presumptuously, for vain display; and (3) profanely, in an alliance with the forces of evil. These are to be thought of, not so much as three temptations which come once to young people, as a recurring, almost constant temptation in their lives during the years of early and middle adolescence when the consciousness of the possession of new power is fresh and keen. In studying the biography of Jesus, Intermediates become acquainted with a moral Conqueror. No example could possibly be more significant for them.

The life of Jesus presents the preeminent example of service. Jesus has no equal in the social quality of his ideals and of his conduct. Where else can we find such sympathy, such constant prevailing desire to help others, such a spirit of sacrifice for others? He has been the inspiration of uncounted thousands who have lived lives of selfsacrifice, giving themselves in service to their fellowmen. This is the period in which the altruistic motive makes its first strong appeal, and because of this, the example of Jesus is at this time of incalculable value.

FORM OF PRESENTATION

How shall the life of Christ be presented to Intermediates? What are the requirements concerning the manner of its presentation which it is important to note?

His life should be so taught as to make him real. A first object is that our pupils shall come to know Jesus. Our purpose is to acquaint them with him. It is easy for the teacher to lose himself in non-essentials and comparatively unimportant particulars. For example, some knowledge of the history of New Testament times is necessary to an understanding of events narrated in the gospels, but our prime purpose is not to teach history. We are to use history as a means of gaining an acquaintanceship with Jesus.

Our effort should be to present his life with a naturalness which will bring him near. To many, even to many devoted Christians, Jesus seems unreal. It is sometimes maintained that it is impossible to so teach his life that he will appear otherwise than as a dim and unreal figure from out the misty past. This is not for a moment to be admitted. The Jesus of the gospels was a real man; in his youth he was a workman, a carpenter; throughout his life he showed himself capable of endurance and exertion, living much of the time out-of-doors, familiar with nature and all natural phenomena. He moved among men on intimate terms, with sympathy for all human needs, with equal friendliness for those of high station and for the outcast, a lover of little children, a teacher, a physician, the helper and friend of all. We are to help our boys and girls thus to see him, that they may live in fellowship with him, feel the impress of his personality, be inspired with his love and care for others, and finally share his purpose.

It is not necessary for the teacher to attach the label of hero to the character of Jesus or to say overmuch about particular deeds or courses of action as being heroic. We may be sure if we succeed in picturing his life so that our pupils actually see it as it was lived among men; if we portray vividly the situations of his ministry, showing clearly the choices and courses of action which reflect his motives and his purposes, his life and character will make its own impression. Better a thousand times that the pupil should be led to a gradually heightening appreciation of the moral grandeur of Jesus until he spontaneously testifies to the impression which the matchless character has made upon him than that the teacher should repeatedly declare Jesus to be a hero when but slight impression has been made upon the pupil's mind.

Jesus should be presented as a leader. In the gospels Jesus is presented as the leader of a group, the twelve, who followed him, learning of him, and then went forth at his command to conquer a world. The organization of a company of disciples who looked to him as their leader resulted in the founding of the church. Nor is his leadership a thing of the past. He is a living leader, the great head of the church, and his followers are engaged to-day in world conquest in his name. His personal leadership, both in his relation to the Twelve and as directing the supreme world enterprise of our day, appeals to Intermediates and makes the biography of Jesus of supreme value to them.

As Jesus was leader of the band of Twelve, so he may be presented as the leader of the class, the one to whom this new group owes loyalty and unquestioning obedience. All of the tact and skill of the teacher should be used to constitute the Intermediate class a group or "gang." As the social instinct ripens and the "gang" naturally widens it may be possible to make the church as a whole to be regarded as the group to which the Intermediate owes allegiance with Jesus still the great leader.

In presenting Jesus as a leader it should be made clear that he is far more than a human leader. He is a leader who is at the same time Master and Lord. Emphasis should be laid upon his tremendous program, a program that was worldwide and that reached into eternity. If the greatness of it is unfolded to Intermediates so that they realize its sweep and catch a vision of the lordship of Jesus, like one of the apostles, they will be ready to declare, Lord, we "will follow thee whithersoever thou goest," and their purpose will be so deep that they will follow him, if need be even to death.

Jesus should be presented as a friend and companion. Jesus is the Great Companion, "the friend that sticketh closer than a brother." The biographies of other heroes are studied for the sake of knowing their character and for the inspiration that comes from the record of their deeds; the study of the biography of Jesus offers to Intermediates companionship with One who will enter into their lives to dissipate their sense of loneliness and be to them an ever present Friend and Helper.

Friendship with Jesus is one of the most attractive and significant forms in which the Christian life may be presented to Intermediates. It would be difficult to find a single term which comes nearer expressing the full meaning of the Christian life than this. It is to be remembered that it is Jesus' own term; one that comes directly out of his association with his disciples. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you . . ." The words which follow read as if they might have been intended especially for Intermediates, they are so true to the conditions of their lives: "Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth." The Junior child is a servant; to him Jesus is Master, King, Lord; he obeys the word of command not asking concerning its meaning or why it is given; henceforth, from these new days of freedom, of initiative, of spirit of inquiry, of new insight into the inner meaning of things—"Henceforth I call you not servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known unto you." The teacher who has the grace and the insight to interpret to Intermediates this conception of Jesus as a Friend, and of the Christian life as friendship with him, will not fail in securing a response.

Jesus should be presented as Saviour. In your own life, when did you first realize a sense of sin? With most children the moral sense dawns some time during the later Primary or the Junior years, and a keen sense of moral failure, such as might lead a child to confess himself a sinner, with a realization of what the word implies, is not likely to come until the Intermediate years, particularly the fifteenth and sixteenth years. When it does come it may be profound, so deep and strong as to lead the adolescent into discouragement and despondency.

Jesus is the Saviour from sin. There is one name given under Heaven and among men whereby men may be saved, the name of Jesus. Some of the statements made concerning Jesus and the adaptability of the biography of Jesus to meet the needs of Intermediates may be made of others, but One only there is who is offered as a Deliverer, a Saviour from the power and the guilt of sin. The time to present Christ as a Deliverer from sin is when the sense of sin comes to be realized. Fortunate indeed is it if when the boy or girl first becomes conscious of guilt the parent or teacher is at hand to tell of One who is able and willing to deliver.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Study Matt. 4. 1-11. Consider the nature of the three temptations. What is their significance for Intermediates?

2. Read Luke 4. 16-30. Picture the whole scene culminating in verse 30. Now turn to John 7. 37-52. What dignity, what majestic power! Would this appeal strongly to Intermediates?

3. Study Mark 8. 27-38; John 6. 15. What self-sacrifice! Do you find here material to meet a need of Intermediates?

4. Consider Luke 22. 24-27 and John 13. 1-5, as showing Jesus' spirit of service of others. Estimate the value of this as an example to Intermediates.

5. Study Luke 6. 12-19; 8. 1-3; 9. 1-6; Matt. 28. 19, 20. Can the leadership of Jesus be made a real and present fact to Intermediates to-day?

6. Consider Mark 2. 13-17 as an example of the friendliness of Jesus. In connection with this think of his promises of perpetual friendship. What need of young people is met in this?

7. Study Mark 2. 1-12. What was the deepest need of the sick man? Is this also a need of Intermediate boys and girls? How would you present this as a lesson to Intermediates? Compare the presentation in the International Graded Lessons, Intermediate Series, Third Year, Lesson 10.

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. In your observation, is the life of Jesus usually taught in Sunday school in such a way as to meet the interests of Intermediates?

2. Do the hymns about Jesus sung in your Sunday school have in them anything to appeal to the heroic spirit? (Compare, for example, such a hymn as "Jesus Paid It All" with "We March, We March to Victory," or "True-hearted, Whole-hearted, Faithful and Loyal.")

3. How would you teach the life of Christ to young people in order to help them most?

LESSON IX

TEACHING THE LIFE OF CHRIST TO YOUNG PEOPLE

Have you ever tried to define to yourself your moral and spiritual needs which could be met by Bible study courses? To what extent do you consider your needs to be common to all young people? If you are so far removed from the period of later youth that you do not clearly recall your aims, hopes, fears, aspirations, desires, temptations and struggles during these years, seek to answer these questions from the standpoint of the young people you know most intimately.

What general principles, growing out of the interests and needs of young people, should be determinative in the selection of lesson courses?

The principle of election should be recognized. As the youth is now making his own decisions in many other matters he will appreciate the privileges of choosing for himself and at least the desire to choose should be recognized.

Courses should be offered which present satisfying ideals. The glowing idealism of young people of this age should be nurtured and strengthened. Material on which it can feed and grow should be provided.

Courses are required which give young people a Christian world view. Whether consciously or not the young person is engaged during these years in working out a philosophy of life, a world view, and it is exceedingly important that he be aided to attain to a Christian view of God and the world.

Courses are required which present opportunities and fields of service. The strong social impulse of these years must not be allowed to weaken and die through lack of opportunities for expression.

Courses of training for service should be offered. The years from seventeen to twenty-five are the most favorable in life for special training. The comparative freedom of young people from heavy responsibilities, their intellectual activity, and their passion for service all combine to make this pre-eminently the best period for courses of training for leadership and teaching in church and Sunday school. To fail here is to lose a great opportunity.

THE SPECIAL ADAPTABILITY OF THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

What special needs of young people are to be met by a study of the life and teaching of Jesus? What qualities in the gospels make them especially adaptable for use in teaching young people and in training them for service?

The teaching of Jesus was originally addressed principally to young people. The Twelve, for the most part, were young men when they were called into service by Jesus. Their exact ages are unknown. The life of the Master, we know, came to its tragic close at thirty-three. His teaching was given in the two or three years preceding. It has generally been supposed that some, probably the majority, of the apostles were younger than Jesus himself, and if we think of the period under consideration as embracing the years eighteen to twenty-four, it may be said to be very probable that a number of the apostles were in this period when Jesus addressed to them the teaching which we have in the gospels.

The teaching of Jesus appeals to the interests of young people. As we should expect, considering that much of it was originally addressed to young people, the teaching of Jesus now appeals to their interests. Had we taken up for consideration particular portions of the gospels containing teachings of Jesus with a view to their use in teaching children in the successive periods passed under review we should have been compelled to say concerning a considerable part: "This should be reserved for middle or later adolescence." When studied under the guidance of an intelligent teacher, who has some understanding of the manners and customs of the Orient and a gift of spiritual insight, it is meat and drink to their souls.

The moral and ethical ideals of Jesus are the most inspiring and satisfying ever given to the world. His personality has been the supreme inspirational force in the life of successive generations of Christian men. In every generation it has proven its power to create high moral ideals in the minds of men of every age, class and condition. His life and his words are inseparable. In both, his standards are supreme, his principles most exalted. He alone meets the exacting demands of young people for moral perfection. A study of his life and teaching is fitted to satisfy and strengthen and make permanent their idealism. They inwardly desire a perfect example by which to pattern their living; they seek a supreme cause to which they may devote their lives; they are prepared for sacrifice to realize their purposes. The Sunday school through study of the life and teaching of Jesus is privileged to reveal to them God's ideal for their lives, and his service as the cause most worthy of their endeavors and sacrifices.

*The life and teaching of Jesus present "the clearest, simplest, worthiest, and truest view of God and the relation of God to men" anywhere to be found.*¹ As Christians, the world view we want our young people to get is the world view of Jesus. There are conceptions of God and views of God's relation to men, and of our relations to our fellowmen, current in our day which are far removed from the teaching of Jesus. We are called upon to be Christians both in life and thought after the pattern of Jesus Christ. Views of God and social and ethical conceptions which are contrary to or fall below the standard set in the teaching of Jesus, whatever their source, are unworthy of his followers. In this period, when our young people are shaping for themselves their permanent religious beliefs, it is exceedingly important that the life and the teaching of Jesus be made a basis of study.

The gospels are in themselves training courses. The teaching of Jesus in the first three gospels was addressed originally to the disciples, much of it to the Twelve in pursuance of Jesus' purpose to train them to go out to preach and to teach in his name. That is to say, the teaching of Jesus was in the first place a training course, and it has lost none of its value for this purpose. Not only so; the gospels in their entirety as they have come down to us may be said to have been virtually training courses used by the early teachers of the church in teaching and training converts to the faith. For what are the gospels? As we have pointed out previously, they are not complete records or biographies of Jesus. They are simply the "deposit of the teaching of the church" during the first decades of its existence. They are material "already fashioned for the work of the teacher. Incomplete from one point of view, from another they are wonderfully perfect . . . They are in the form in which the teachers of the first century put them"¹

More emphasis should be placed in teacher training courses upon the life and teaching of Jesus. Here we are at the center of the Christian religion. While in preparation for our work as his teachers, we should give ourselves earnestly to contemplation of his life and character, and to the study of his words, that when we go out to teach in his name we may fitly and fully represent him.

FORM AND CONTENT OF COURSES

In what form can the life and teaching of Jesus be best presented to young people? What should be the content of the courses? Certain general principles may be stated:

Direct study of the gospels should be provided. It has sometimes been said that there is too much teaching about the Bible and not enough teaching of the Bible. This may easily be true when the case is that of young people and the life and teaching of Jesus. Study about the gospels will not be as helpful or satisfying as study of the gospels. A critical study of questions of authorship, date, and literary structure may yield important information but fail entirely in deepening or strengthening the religious impulses. The direct study of the gospels for their religious values is the most important need of most young people in our Sunday-school classes.

The example and teaching of Jesus should be brought to bear upon the practical problems of young people. The personal problems of young life are many and perplexing. The youth is seeking to adjust himself to his own peculiar place in the world. For many Senior young people this constitutes the most insistent and pressing problem. Out of this many lesser problems arise. Numerous problems also grow out of their relationship to others in the home, in business, and in social life. "What ought I to do?" the sensitive conscience of the young man or the young woman constantly asks. All of the problems of young people, which they meet in daily life, should be discussed in the light of the principles enunciated in the teaching of Jesus and exemplified in his life.

The life and teaching of Jesus should be used to deepen and enrich the devotional life. These are years when the spiritual life can readily be deepened and the opportunity should not pass unused. Surely no more valuable means can be found than the devotional study of the gospels. Henry Drummond was once asked to suggest three courses of Bible study that would directly influence spiritual growth. "I would recommend," he said, "that you study, first, the life of Christ; second, the life of Christ, and third, the life of Christ." Out of this study there should come an abiding love for Jesus Christ, a more intense loyalty, and a permanent habit of daily and hourly communion,—a renewed and heightened appreciation of the reality and the value of friendship with the Saviour. The realization that he enters as the most intimate of all friends into the experiences of daily life,—sharing its burdens and disappointments, and that every trial borne, every temptation overcome, and every service rendered is above all else for his sake transforms and illumines the most commonplace life.

Some classes will desire to study the teaching of Jesus in systematic form. Not all classes of young people will be prepared for an intensive, systematized study of Jesus' religious teachings, but such a course should be included in an elective group. What did Jesus teach concerning God? What did he teach about man? About sin? About salvation? About the kingdom of God? What did he teach about himself, his nature, his mission, and the significance of his death? These are fundamental subjects of Christian belief. They are also subjects prominent in Jesus' teaching and the study of them should be made available to young people.

The opportunity should be offered for the study of the social teachings of Jesus. Is there material in the gospels for the nurture and direction of the altruistic ideals and purposes of youth? Did Jesus have aught to say concerning social duties? Did he enunciate principles which have application to-day in social relations, in business, in community life, and in the state? Without question much of the inspiration for modern social reform has come directly from the example and the teaching of Jesus. No finer introduction to the study of social duties can be found than a course based upon the social teaching of Jesus. It provides an unexcelled means of developing and using the latent resources of social service in which young life is so rich.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Read John 1. 35-51. Recall that Jesus was at this time a young man of about thirty. Picture this group as a company of young men, some of them younger than Jesus. Would this help you in teaching the life of Christ to young people?

2. Consider the moral and ethical standards of Jesus: perfection, Matt. 5. 48; purity, Matt. 5. 8; loyalty, Luke 9. 62; self-sacrifice, Matt. 16. 24, 25. Are these ideals which appeal strongly to young people?

3. What was the one all-inclusive principle of Jesus? Read John 13. 34, 35; 15. 12; Matt. 22. 34-40. Is this the supreme law of life to be set before young people?

4. What importance did Jesus attach to serving our fellowmen? Verify your answer from his teachings.

5. Study Matt. 12. 9-14. Note the appeal of Jesus to the reason. Is this a teaching method of large value in teaching young people?

6. What was the personal attitude of Jesus toward those who looked to him for instruction? Read Mark 10. 21. Is this attitude of sympathy and friendly love an important requisite in a teacher?

QUESTIONS FOR THOUGHT AND OBSERVATION

1. Is the question, "What would Jesus have me do?" practical as a principle of guidance for everyday life?

2. How may the gospels be used in training young people for Christian service?

3. What place should be given to the life of Christ in a curriculum for adults?

LESSON X

ADULTS AND THE LIFE OF CHRIST

Adult life differs from the periods of childhood and youth in that it spans a very much larger number of years. The periods which we have had under consideration thus far in our study embrace but three to six years each, while the adult period begins, properly speaking, at the close of adolescence, that is, at about twenty-five, and continues to the end of life.

STUDY COURSES FOR ADULTS

What is the aim of the Sunday school in its work with adults? Can you formulate your own statement of aim? The Adult Department should be worthy of being called a school of religion for adults. As such it should be its purpose to deepen, enrich, and strengthen the religious life of all its members. It should aim to make all of its members loyal, intelligent, efficient Christians. Consider that young people who enroll in the Adult Department of the Sunday school at the beginning of adult life may continue in attendance upon its sessions for a period of fifteen to sixty years. What kind of a program of study is required in order that the Sunday school in the course of these years may fulfill its ministry to them? Consider, again, the range of age represented in the adult membership of a Sunday school. Are the religious needs of elderly people identical with those of young people who have just entered the first period of adult life? As these questions are pondered does it not become evident that the Sunday school's program of study for adults must be broad, comprehensive, and varied? What types of courses should be included in a program of study, or curriculum, for adults?

Advanced courses in the Bible should be offered. In thousands of Sunday schools, young people are now being graduated from the Graded Lesson Course. Through this course many of them have become familiar with real Bible study to an extent practically unknown in connection with the Sunday school in earlier days. If these Sunday schools are to command the continued interest of these graduates they must provide a program of advanced Bible study. Young people who have seriously addressed themselves to the study of the intermediate and senior graded courses will not be satisfied with haphazard and fragmentary Bible instruction in adult classes. A considerable number of courses which provide specialized Bible study should be offered.

Elementary Bible courses should be provided. There will always be in the Sunday school some adults who do not have an elementary working knowledge of the Bible,—new converts or new recruits to the Sunday school whose early training in the Bible was neglected. For these, elementary courses will be needed.

Training courses for lay workers should be provided. The Adult Department should share with the Senior Department the responsibility for training workers for school and church. A class of men in training for work with boys and another for service in official positions in church or school would be a possibility in many schools. Adult church members should be trained for effective cooperation in all of the modern movements for social betterment. The church will be able to give constructive guidance to the great movement now on for social reconstruction only as it instructs its members concerning the significance of the movement and trains them for participation in it.

Training courses for parents are needed. One of the most acute needs of modern society is for courses for parents in child nature and child nurture, particularly the moral and religious nurture of the child in the home. Our Sunday schools are failing with many of their pupils because of a lack of positive home training. In many cases it is not that parents are disinterested in the religious welfare of their children. They do not know how to proceed in order to develop righteous moral character and normal religious interest and activity.

Such other courses should be offered as are needed to make men and women intelligent, loyal, useful Christians. The Bible will never be displaced as the great, permanent source book of spiritual truth and inspiration, but the education of the adult in religion involves more than Bible instruction. Courses in various other subjects such as church history, the development of Protestant thought, and the rise and progress of Christian Missions, are required and should have a place in the adult curriculum.

THE PLACE OF COURSES IN THE LIFE AND TEACHING OF JESUS

What place have the life and teaching of Jesus in such a curriculum of adult study as we have outlined? It will help us to answer this question if we consider the Master's procedure with the men whom he called to discipleship and service.

How did Jesus train the Twelve? What importance did Jesus attach to his work of teaching and training his disciples? In answering the question remember that he devoted to them the most of his time and energy. What was the result? Would the twentieth century have known so much as the names of these twelve men if they had not been taught of Christ? He called them to follow him and taught them, and who can measure their service to the world? It is evident to anyone who studies the gospels that Jesus placed a high estimate upon the value of his teaching. Will it not do in some measure for modern men what it did for men of the first century? Jesus not only taught his disciples,—he brought his personality to bear upon them. Is this also accomplished when to-day we lead men to study the life of Jesus? What is the meaning of John 15. 26; 16. 13, 14 in this connection?

The life and teaching of Jesus should be given the central place in the program of adult study in the Sunday school.

COURSES WHICH SHOULD BE OFFERED

Read again what was said in the preceding lesson concerning the form and content of courses for young people in the life and teaching of Jesus. To what extent is this statement applicable to courses for adults? It will be agreed, we think, that certain of these principles are equally applicable to courses for both young people and adults; others, if applied to courses for adults, require adaptation, while some few of them are applicable only to courses for young people. The value of the subject is not exhausted by the brief study which may be given to it in the senior years. As Bishop McDowell has said, "Now the mastery of this teaching in its manner and its substance, its form and its essence, its relation to activity and to personality, its eternal meaning under the forms of time, its germinal quality in all time, its universal meaning expressed in local terms, its living principles in its particular statements, its philosophy and its ethical quality, its religious value and literary perfection, its historic interest and world-wide application,—the mastery of this teaching is the supreme intellectual achievement of life. Upon this task one might spend his years." ¹

¹In the School of Christ, page 51.

What are some of the most important paths of approach to this exhaustless field? What are some general subjects of study which we must not overlook in forming a curriculum for adults?

Jesus and everyday life. If a single subject were to be chosen as a designation for the teaching of Jesus it might well be the principles of life. "The immediate subject of his teaching is unmistakable. It is conduct, life, morality, character . . . His first teaching is of duty, conscience, humanity, love, the conduct of life."¹ We seek in vain in the gospels for a moral code by which to regulate our conduct. Almost all of Jesus' teaching grows out of actual life situations. In these concrete situations Jesus gave people great moral principles which he led them to apply for themselves. This alone is sufficient to give his teaching universal significance applicable for all time. Conditions of life have changed, but the moral and spiritual needs of men are much the same in the twentieth as in the first century. Men and women long for help on the practical problems of everyday living. They are immensely more interested in securing light and aid on problems of conduct than they are in theories of ethics or the doctrinal speculations of theologians. "What would Jesus have me do?" is a question which never fails to interest. Is it a vain question? By no means. We cannot do a more helpful thing than to acquaint them with Jesus' principles of life and to guide them in applying his principles to everyday problems.

The social program of Jesus. Did Jesus promulgate a social program? Do we find regulations in the gospels for the suppression of poverty, for improvement of conditions of living, for lowering the death rate, or for elimination of the social evil? Jesus was first of all a teacher of religion.

He was not a social reformer in the modern sense of the term. He enunciated no "social program," as such. Yet it is less than a full statement of the truth to say that time and again profound social changes have resulted from a sincere effort to understand the full import of his teachings and to apply them to existing conditions. Are there social implications of the teaching of Jesus which are significant as applied to the problems of to-day? Is there material in the gospels with which to build a new conscience on not one but many ancient evils? To these questions, none but an affirmative answer can be given. Moreover, men and women everywhere are vitally interested in social questions and this approach to their study will attract and benefit many.

The religious teaching of Jesus. It is to be remembered that the teaching work of Jesus was all the more vital because it was truth applied to life, not truth cast into a completely rounded system. Better a single utterance which meets an actual need of life than volumes of dry, lifeless, systematized doctrine worked out apart from human needs. Does not the gathering together of Jesus' teaching upon a single important subject, such, for example, as the kingdom of God, or upon the nature of God and his relations to men, meet an actual need of our lives? So with other fundamental subjects of Christian belief. The study of the teaching of Jesus in systematized form should therefore be made available for adults, as well as for young people. (See page 238.)

Critical study of the gospels. The average man has neither time nor inclination for extended critical study. Questions of authorship, date of composition, sources, transmission and purity of the text do not particularly concern him. He is willing to leave these problems to scholars and to accept their verdict without questioning. Ordinarily, therefore, there is little call for the critical study of the gospels in the Sunday school. Exceptional situations exist, however, in which such a study might be pursued with great profit. For three quarters of a century the documents composing the New Testament have been subjected to prolonged and searching examination. At times controversy has raged fiercely. As a result the historical basis of Christianity has been wonderfully confirmed. The foundations of our religion stand secure. The historical Christ has more nearly universal acknowledgment than ever before. These results, together with some acquaintance with the processes and lines of evidence which have produced them, should be made available to groups of adults whose faith and life would be helped by such knowledge.

RESULTS TO BE EXPECTED

What gain may be expected to accrue to adults from the study of the life and teaching of Jesus? What will it do for them?

It will make Christ real. For the adult this is something different than for the intermediate (see page 228), just as the needs of mature life differ from those of the early 'teens. Long ago Martin Luther declared that the supreme office of the Bible is to show us Christ and in him all that we need to know even if we never see any other book. The gospels will do more for us than to present a record of facts in the life of Jesus. They pulsate with divine life. If we come to them with open, receptive minds they will bring Christ near, even into our own hearts, and make him real to us as the One through whom God supplies our every need.

It will reveal God. What was Jesus' word to Philip when Philip said to him, "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us"? Read John 14. 8, 9. In this Jesus declared that he unveiled God. Constantly, in the lives of adults there is a tendency for the vision of God to grow dim. To multitudes of men and women God seems far removed from human life, a vague and unreal figure. A supreme need is for some means by which the Heavenly Father shall be brought near and made a real and living Presence. In the Christ of the gospels just this need is met. God is brought very near to those who find Jesus their Teacher, Friend, and Saviour. Jesus is the supremely convincing testimony of the fact of God and of the character of God. "If one will not hear that biography of love, that memoir of pity, that historic record of redeeming grace, neither will he believe though one rise from the dead."

It will reveal man to himself. The average adult needs just this revelation. The years of middle life bring disillusionment. What is to make up for the fading of the heightened colors with which youth tinged the most commonplace things of life? What is to take the place of the keen zest and enthusiasm of early years? Is everything now to become common? Are the high values to be lost out of life and the soul's attitude to become that of indifference and spiritual stolidity? How may the vision of youth, renewed, refined, and spiritualized, be imparted to the soul as a permanent possession? Just this service the study of the life and teaching of Jesus is fitted to render. In him we have a revelation of a triumphant spiritual life. In him we see what God intends for every son of man. In him we find the spiritual dynamic to revitalize youth's motives and purposes. In him we find power for the realization of our highest ideals.

Contact with Christ imparts life and health to the soul. The earliest disciples found companionship with Jesus to be a savor of life unto life. In ways which they could not explain the influence of his words and his personality reached down to the roots of their being, affecting feeling, thought, and will, and effecting a transformation of their whole natures. "Disciple," we are to remember, means learner. Those to-day who have the spirit of discipleship find that contact with him through the written word has a like efficacy. A missionary to New Guinea writes:

I have myself seen murderers and cannibals live peaceful lives. I have seen shameless thieves and robbers become honest; I have seen the quarrelsome and selfish become kind and gentle. But I have never heard of such changes arising from any other agency than that of the Word whose entrance bringeth life, and whose acceptance is the power of God unto salvation.

The influence holds among all classes and conditions of men. Everywhere and always Jesus Christ is the way, the truth, and the life.

SUGGESTIONS FOR DAILY STUDY

1. Read the request of the disciples in Luke 11. 1. This is the only recorded instance of the disciples asking Jesus to teach them. Have we come to Jesus with a like request?

2. Consider Jesus' preference for teaching individuals or a small group rather than the multitude. What does this indicate concerning his method?

3. What is the explanation of the lack of emphasis upon organization in the gospels? Consider the significance of these passages in relation to the question: John 10. 10; 6. 63.

4. The teaching of Jesus was almost entirely presented in concrete, life situations. In teaching adults we cannot reproduce the situations, but we can bring together from various situations teachings on certain great themes. Do you find any trace of an effort of this kind in the gospels? Study the preface to Luke's gospel 1. 1-4. What evidence do you find in Matthew of this having been done?

5. Read John, chapters 1-7. Disregard entirely the chapter and verse divisions, and read for the general impression of the whole. Recall the words of an eminent preacher: "I think my analysis of books is the result of having read them on an average from forty to fifty times."

6. Continue your reading of John, taking to-day chapters 8-14.

7. Complete the reading of John, chapters 15-21.

THE COMING SCHOOL OF THE CHURCH

CHAPTER I

THE CHURCH AND THE SCHOOL

When the bride bravely takes the solemn vow of the wedding ceremony, she enters into larger relationships and changes her name without changing her identity.

The Sunday School is entering into larger relationships and may be expected to change its name. It is in the process of becoming the school of the church. Without sacrificing the splendid gains of the past, when it was largely organized and administered apart from the church, it is now on the way toward accepting its place as a department of the church, and is seeking to give the church a vision of the importance and breadth of religious education. Our course of study aims to give the school its proper place within the church, and to help the church in the culture of growing life in the things of God.

The school of the church has been made by two influences: (a) The Lord's command to his church to teach, and (b) the development of popular education under democracy. The New Testament reveals the great Teacher gathering and training a company of disciples who were to continue his ministry. "Go ye, therefore, . . . teaching" (Matt. 28 : 19). His disciples are made responsible for perpetuating this service. "The things which thou hast heard from me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also" (2 Tim. 2 : 2). "God hath set in the church . . . teachers" (1 Cor. 12 : 28). This obligation of the church is the adequate authority for the school of the church.

The impulse of the church has been intensified by the great modern social movement which is making the privileges of the few the rights of all. The opportunity for knowledge and training must be offered to everybody. Since the State cannot properly provide religious education, it is demanded of the Church that it meet this imperative need of every member of the community. Progressive democracy asks the church to provide a religious training worthy to be a part of an increasingly efficient education.

This lesson will consider: the ultimate authority for the school of the church as the command of Christ; the strong molding influence of the modern social movement; the increasing responsibility of the church; the proper organization of the school; the potential place of the pastor in the school; and a general definition of what the school seeks to do.

I. CHRIST PRESCRIBES for his church A MINISTRY OF TEACHING.

Because all power in things heavenly and earthly has been given to Jesus Christ, we recognize no other authority for the church and its activities. He bade the early disciples: (a) to become witnesses or heralds of the good news (John 1 : 41; Matt. 10 : 5; Acts 1 : 8); (b) to persuade men to become learners of him (Matt. 28 : 19); (c) to prepare for and practise teaching according to all his instructions (Matt. 28 : 20); and (d) to secure further training in doing. (John 13 : 15-17.)

Teaching is the obligation of the whole church. It is the work of the church in every community. Under unfavorable conditions it may be difficult. Workers may be few, of limited ability and small leisure. But the King commands, and the church can delegate this responsibility to no other agency.

2. MODERN DEMOCRACY INSISTS UPON the best possible EDUCATION FOR ALL.

Jesus placed a high value upon the common man. Under the rule of the people every individual is given equal rights. Because each man must share the burden of government, he must obtain an adequate education, or democratic society is in danger. The more clearly it is perceived that the safety and progress of a free people depend upon education, the more generously and earnestly will the opportunities of education be provided for all. In response to this demand for public education in America we build more perfectly appointed buildings, train more carefully a selected company of teachers and administrators, publish text-books more interesting and more pedagogical, compel more regular attendance and study of all children, and place an increasing load of taxation upon willing communities.

No education is worthy the name which omits morals and religion. No adequate basis for morality can be given apart from religion. Since freedom of conscience gives to every man the right to his own religious convictions, the State cannot teach or enforce religion. The obligation to provide religious instruction rests upon the home and the church. Both the home and the church must appreciate their grave responsibility, and learn to cooperate in religious training for the welfare of the individual and the good of society.

3. RELIGIOUS EDUCATION has been accepted as a PRIMARY RESPONSIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

In the first Christian century every Jewish village had its synagogue school. The early Christian church developed catechetical schools. Through the Middle Ages and increasingly through the Reformation period efforts were made, here and there, to teach religion to the children. But not until 1780, when Robert Raikes started a school in Soot Alley, Gloucester, England, for the boys of the street, was there a school which considered the need of the child rather than the necessity of teaching the tenets of the church. It is for this reason Raikes has been called the founder of the modern Sunday School movement. The first Sunday School in America was started in Virginia in 1786. Canada had her first Sunday School in 1811. Unlike the Raikes schools, those in this country were for the most part conducted by volunteer workers, in the church buildings, and for the children of the families of the church.

Two conditions have greatly influenced the American Sunday School: (a) the separation of Church and State, limiting the teaching of religion in the public schools; and (b) the adoption of the school by the church and the denominational organization.

Since good citizenship is impossible without moral character, public-school leaders urge the need of a religious training the church alone can give, in order to make strong the moral preparations for citizenship. In some American communities the public-school authorities dismiss pupils from the public-school session to classes in the churches preferred by their parents. Some church communions have felt the need of the religious instruction of their children so strongly that they have built parochial school buildings and maintained a trained teaching force at considerable expense in addition to their tax for public education.

Protestant churches have nominally adopted the school as part of their work. Splendid progress has been made in school organization and equipment, and in the development of an adequate volunteer teaching force. But many churches do not see the changed conditions in America demanding a more competent teaching of the fundamentals of religion, and do not hear the call of their Lord, who would make his church the great teacher.

There is encouragement in the official adoption of the church school by various denominations as a recognized part of their organized work. Great help has come and will come from the interdenominational fellowship of all interested in Sunday School work. Denominational action tends to give the school an authoritative place in the church program.

4. THE SCHOOL, when properly organized, is a DEPARTMENT OF THE CHURCH.

There is some confusion of thought as to the place of the school. In some instances church-members are carrying on the school in the church building by using the working forces of the church and appealing for community support in the name of the church, while refusing to seek or accept the direction of the church. In many instances the church is not sufficiently informed to direct its school. It has not been aroused to a vital interest in the work of the school.

In most churches there is need of further agitation and instruction in the church's responsibility for its school. Because it is the work of the church, it must face the demand for an adequate school equipment, must provide a regular place in its budget for the support of the school, must maintain a church board or committee to care for the interests of the school, must be concerned about the matter and method of the teaching of the school, must at least approve the election of the officers of the school, must definitely include the work of the school in the church program, and must interest itself in the denominational and general affiliations of the school.

On the other hand, the officers and teachers of the school must recognize their individual and collective subordination to the church. The loyal school seeks to further all the interests of the church and to participate heartily in all its undertakings which are related to the work of the school, including plans for evangelism, missionary instruction and offering, new building enterprises, and community movements, and will not adopt any important policy or method without full consultation with the pastor and officers of the church. Such a school will discourage the notion that school-membership is a substitute for church-membership. Loyalty demands attendance at church service and the support of church plans.

5. THE PASTOR has a unique opportunity in the school as the official REPRESENTATIVE OF THE WHOLE CHURCH.

The school which accepts itself as a department of the church will give the pastor of the church his place of honor and responsibility. The conscientious pastor will earnestly seek to enter upon his threefold opportunity:

(1) The pastor may become the school's helper-at-large. He may cultivate the acquaintance and friendship of all the members of the school, and make them feel his personal interest in all they are doing. He may serve as a trusted adviser in the larger matters of school policy, without becoming involved in the details of administration. He may tactfully correct an overemphasis upon one side of the work, and keep the balance between the activities of the school and other departments of the church. He may assist in deepening the spirit of worship by suggestion or by accepting the leadership of the opening service upon invitation. He may remind the school of its denominational and other general relationships, and enforce its missionary obligation. He will use his position to arouse the church to its opportunity through the school.

(2) The pastor may become the school's educational director. Because of the multiplication of pastoral duties in a large church, the full time of a trained Director of Religious Education should be secured. Where such an officer is at work he will closely relate himself to the pastor in all he does. In the absence of such a paid worker, the pastor will feel the necessity of preparing himself for this responsibility by a careful course of training, obtained preferably in the theological seminary, and by reading, by attendance at institutes, summer assemblies, or other schools of religious education, and by observation of good schools. He will then make his concern the training of the teachers and workers. He will encourage the appointment of a church committee on religious education, and work with it. Through such a committee he will supervise the teaching as to the selection of lesson courses and the efficiency of the instruction. He will assist the superintendent in strengthening the interest and programs of the workers' conferences, or officers-teachers' meeting. He may teach one class, but only for a limited time, lest the school forget he is the pastor of the whole school. He may teach all the classes of the upper departments in rotation, so as to suggest improved methods of teaching. He will make it his business to hold the school to the attainment of its standard, and remind the leaders of ideals easily forgotten.

(3) The pastor may become the school's evangelistic leader. He will cultivate in the teachers a passion for winning souls. He will plan with the superintendent the evangelistic work of the year. He will use his friendly relations with all the unconverted for a personal word at the proper time, for the public appeal, or for the class appeal as he teaches classes in turn. Some time in the year he should organize and teach a converts' class at some hour during the week.

6. THE GREAT PURPOSE of the school of the church is to cause individuals of all ages TO KNOW AND PRACTISE THE TRUTH OF GOD THROUGH CHRIST.

The school is seeking to express the spirit of Christ. It seeks to enlist every man, woman, and child in an attempt to know God and obey him. It aims to give to each a trained teacher and leader.

The work of the school is therefore:

(1) Recruiting—which aims to carry religious helpfulness to every uncared-for individual in the community by enlisting him in some department of the school.

(2) Teaching—which aims to adapt instruction in God's revealed truth to the needs and capabilities of each person under its care.

(3) Evangelism—which aims to secure the conversion of every unconverted member of the school.

(4) Worship—which aims to train the individual and the group in the spirit and habit of adoration, thanksgiving, confession, petition, and offering.

(5) Service—which aims to encourage and direct the practice of the truth taught, especially in forms of social service.

(6) Training—which aims to develop specialized church leaders in education, and give the beginnings of training for all kinds of organized Christian service.

(7) Missionary—which aims to instruct and enlist in all the missionary endeavor of the church.

(8) Fellowship—which aims to establish a strong social tie binding teachers and pupils in service and worship, and also maintain the wider fellowship with all Sunday School and kingdom workers.

The following chapters will consider from various points of view the organization and conduct of the school as it seeks to realize the aims outlined above.

THE LEADER'S PREPARATION

For the benefit of those who do not have access to the complete bibliography, "References for further study" are made principally to a selected list of six books. It is urged that classes supply themselves with these:

Athearn: "The Church School."

Cope: "The Modern Sunday School in Principle and Practice."

Tralle: "Sunday School Experience."

Brown: "The Superintendent and His Work."

Fergusson: "How to Run a Little Sunday School."

Burton and Mathews: "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday School."

Subjects should be allotted to different members of the class for advanced study. Reports on these assignments should be called for some time during the next lesson period. In preparing the lesson for teaching, first write an outline of the chapter, then do the supplementary reading. Brief suggestions are offered on the presentation of each lesson. Leave time for the discussion of important points. Call for a brief review of the previous lesson each time as an introduction to the lesson presentation.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

Ask why the church should have a school.

1. Is there anything in Christ's command or example requiring it?
2. What conditions in popular education make a church school imperative?

What shall we call this school?

1. What was the history of religious education before Raikes?
2. What sort of schools did Raikes establish?
3. How did they differ from the present school of the church?

If we have a school of the church,

1. What will be its aim?
2. What will be the relation of the pastor, director of religious education, superintendent, and teacher to the school?

Have each member of the class write out and read in turn his definition of the true work of the school of the church.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Who were the religious teachers of ancient Israel? (See Kent's "Great Teachers of Judaism and Christianity.")
2. Make a study of Jesus, the Teacher, from the Gospels.
3. Compare the results in Christian life and character of three schools, outside, alongside, and inside the church.
4. Ascertain what ideas the workers of your church and school have of the purpose and aim of your church school.
5. Give a brief history of the Sunday School movement in this country. (See Cope, "The Modern Sunday School in Principle and Practice," or Cope, "The Evolution of the Sunday School.")
6. Prepare a discussion of the work of Robert Raikes.

CHAPTER II

THE CHURCH ORGANIZED FOR EDUCATION

"In no country of the world has the principle of association been more successfully applied to a greater number of objects than in America," wrote De Tocqueville. Since the days of this friendly critic of America, voluntary organizations have greatly increased, and especially organizations with religious activities. The women, the young people, the boys and girls, and the men have been organized under many different names, and in each case general organizations have sought to effect subordinate organizations in local churches.

Each of these general religious movements emphasizes some one phase of church work and organization to the exclusion of others. The unity of the church is endangered. Workers are trained to a limited vision of the church task, and sometimes to a loyalty to an organization made superior to the church itself. It is better to have activity among one group of church workers which have been stimulated from without, rather than have a dead church. Yet each church owes it to itself and its whole work, to prevent overlapping and competition, to secure an effective harmony of operation, and to meet all the needs of its constituency for teaching and training.

I. A CHURCH COMMITTEE OF EDUCATION should have the direction of all the varied training work of the church.

The purpose of this committee is the encouragement and strengthening of all teaching efforts. The committee may be three or more, and should be composed of the most competent church workers in education. It is desirable that this committee be representative, informed in the theory and practice of religious education, and in sympathetic cooperation with church work. Authority must be given the committee to maintain a general supervision of all teaching, courses of study, and all forms of organization for training, with power to harmonize differences, eliminate competition and duplication, and initiate new efforts. The pastor will be a member of the committee by virtue of his office.

A Director of Religious Education should be employed, where possible, as the executive officer of the Church Committee of Education. He will relate himself helpfully to each training organization of the church, and seek to carry out the ideals and policies of the committee. He will be a paid officer of the church, and as such be given a place of leadership in each church group. He should be chosen because of his knowledge of religious education and his ability as a leader and organizer.

2. AN ADVISORY CHURCH COUNCIL OF EDUCATION may be constituted to secure the cooperation in one plan of all church organizations engaged in teaching or training.

We must face the conditions as they exist in most churches. If we were systematizing the teaching work of the church without any inheritance of organizations from the past, a more simple solution might be offered. But various offices and machinery under many different names have been in operation for years. While the Sunday School program is the broadest and most comprehensive, other organizations feel a coequal authority. To meet the situation tactfully and effectively, it will be better to devise some plan which enlists the efforts of all toward harmony and unity. As a possible solution of this situation, the plan of an Advisory Church Council of Education is recommended for churches which feel the difficulties arising from many unrelated and overlapping organizations. There is little experimentation to fall back upon, although the idea has been used in other forms of church work, and commends itself to the democratic constitution of the church.

Organizing the Church for Education

The council should be constituted by the Church Committee on Education, which will serve as its Executive Committee. Its membership will consist of the committee, the pastor, the general superintendent of the school, supervisors of classification and instruction, the principal and one teacher from each school department, the executive officers of all societies under the direction of the Committee on Education with one delegate from each, and one delegate each from the organized adult and young people's classes of the school. The council will meet several times during the year. It will seek to advise, not legislate. It will agree upon a single program of instruction and activity for the church upon the recommendation of the committee. It will consider differences, remove friction, seek to simplify machinery, and work for educational efficiency and progress.

3. THE EXECUTIVE LEADERSHIP of the school is properly vested in a GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT and his associates.

Care and prayer should mark the choice of the general superintendent of the school. It is not to be taken for granted that he must succeed himself. Each year earnest search will be made for the most competent man or woman whom the church can command. The ideal superintendent has competence in two directions: (a) in ability as an executive in a cooperative enterprise, and (b) in ability as an educator. Educational ability must include a knowledge of school theory and an increasing efficiency in its practice. A good superintendent will be a diligent reader of modern books on the Sunday School and its work, and be able to urge reading courses on his teachers. He will attend conventions, institutes, schools of method, and summer assemblies, and become acquainted with Sunday School leaders in his own denomination and beyond. Let no busy man who is the choice of the church refuse this high office because of its big demands. By the help of the Lord, who calls him to this ministry, and by the use of odd moments determinedly snatched, he can increasingly qualify for this great service.

Because the general superintendent is charged with so many details of administration he has need of assistance in the necessary educational oversight and direction. In a large school it is advisable to name separate officers as supervisors. In a small school this work may be undertaken as an additional responsibility by competent teachers.

The Supervisor of Enrolment will have charge of the classifying and grading of all pupils, new and old. The Supervisor of Instruction may be the Director of Religious Education if a paid worker is employed, or the Principal of the Teacher-training Department. This officer will seek to improve the teaching and study of the school, and recommend the transfer of misfit and the resignation of unfit teachers. The Supervisor of Special Teaching will seek to strengthen the missionary and temperance and social service teaching. In some instances this supervisor will actually teach selected classes, but his main task is to secure effective teaching by the regular teachers.

4. The school should be organized by DEPARTMENTS BASED ON THE PERIODS OF PUPIL LIFE.

Modern business organization combines specialization and unity. The modern Sunday School develops departmental specialists with a healthy school spirit. Educational specialization must follow life processes. Because it is a school and dealing with growing life, the educational departments follow the divisions by which nature marks off normal growth.

By common agreement the following departments are recognized in a good school:

1. Cradle Roll Department, including pupils 1, 2, and 3 years of age.

2. Beginners' Department, including pupils 4 and 5 years of age.

3. Primary Department, including pupils 6, 7, and 8 years of age.

4. Junior Department, including pupils 9, 10, 11, and 12 years of age.

(These four departments are commonly known as the Elementary Division.)

5. Intermediate Department, including pupils 13, 14, 15, and 16 years of age.

6. Senior Department, including pupils 17, 18, 19, and 20 years of age.

(These two departments are commonly known as the Secondary Division.)

7. Adult Department, including pupils over twenty years of age.

8. Home Department, including pupils who study outside of the school, without regular attendance.

9. Teacher-training Department, including pupils preparing for the teaching service of the church.

(These three departments are commonly known as the Adult Division.)

The Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations recommends that the year 12 be placed either with the Juniors or Intermediates, and that the Senior or Young People's Department be extended to cover the twenty-fourth year. The groups would then be Junior, 9, 10, 11 (12 optional); Intermediates, 13, 14, and 12 optional; Senior, 15, 16, 17; and Young People 18-24.

The school, whose present small membership prevents the organization of each of the above departments, should follow the divisions indicated, and then seek to develop the departments as rapidly as possible.

A department is set off for its separate work by the selection of a principal of the department and a secretary. The principal will be responsible for the department programs of worship, instruction, and activity, train helpers and teachers, hold regular meetings of the department workers, and report the department's needs and results to the superintendent of the school.

5. School efficiency demands the ORGANIZATION OF THE CLASSES in the upper departments.

Classes in the Beginners' Department should number no more than six; in the Primary, six to eight; in the Junior, eight to ten. Intermediate classes should be organized under some name and form that appeals to their imagination, such as The Knights of King Arthur. These organizations will be temporary in their service. Character will be dwarfed if all the meaning of life is forced into the narrow mold of knighthood, scouting, or camp.

Teen-age and adult classes need organizations that look toward definite objectives in service. Class organization deepens the interest by sharing the responsibility. It trains leadership, and draws forth originality and spontaneity in doing good. Class efficiency is not measured by numbers alone, but by the enlistment of all the membership in individual study and helpful service.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

Have the class name some of the many organizations to be found in the church to-day. Put list on blackboard.

Check off from this list all the organizations appealing to a single group, as, for instance, all appealing to the junior age.

Where these conflict or overlap, ask what would be the work of a Church Committee of Religious Education, what the work of an Advisory Church Council of Education.

Discuss with the class the place and work of a director of religious education.

If Baby John is to grow to manhood in your church school, what departments will be needed to give him an opportunity for the best religious education?

Ask what general officers every school requires; what additional officers will a graded school require?

Close with an application of the principles discussed in this chapter to your own school. Are they all recognized and operating? If not, what changes are necessary, and how can they be brought about?

Call for reports on special assignments, and make assignments of special topics for next lesson.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Tabulate the organizations of some large active church which appeal to the young people for support, and show any overlapping.

2. Follow in imagination the life of a child through such a church; what points of his religious life will receive emphasis and what will be neglected?

3. Discuss the proper age divisions for the different departments. Where should the twelve-year-old be put?

4. Draw up a plan for an educational organization which you consider ideal for your own church.

5. Visit a school having a good superintendent, and note his strong and weak points.

CHAPTER III

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SCHOOL

In every well-ordered family each member faithfully performs the service that is his, and also contributes his share of spirit and life to the home. The school is like the home in its intimate associations. In addition to the unique personal giving of good cheer, sympathy, and strength from each member of the school, we are divided into three classes of workers: officers, teachers, and student body.

I. THE EFFICIENCY of the school as an organization DEPENDS PRIMARILY UPON THE EXECUTIVE OFFICERS.

The Superintendent should be chosen because he has shown certain abilities, and because he gives promise of developing in the job. No church can call to this office a perfectly trained man. In every church there is a man or woman who could become competent, if willing to try and determined to grow.

In this officer we ask a strong, clean, winsome, Christian character, since his high place before the eyes and ears of boys and girls makes his example thrice more potent than his words. We need a man who has been trained in the work of the school, if possible. When the errand-boy climbs up to the manager's desk by his own ability, we have a natural leader who knows the ins and outs of the business. We need that peculiar quality of executive leadership which hides itself behind coworkers who are generous-hearted volunteers, and brings out their best. We need a man who sincerely likes folks, all kinds of folks, and goes out to them eagerly in a desire to help. We need a man who can hold his tongue, keep his temper, endure hard and undeserved knocks, and never lose his smile. We need a man of careful judgment, able to take counsel and do his own thinking. We need a man who increasingly knows his Bible and his Lord.

The Secretary seeks to establish and maintain friendly relations between the school and the scholar by means of mechanical records and a personal touch. He needs assistant secretaries in each organized department of the school. He will keep a card-index of each scholar, showing previous Sunday School relationship, if any, parents' names and address, birthday, grade in school, occupation, attendance, promotions, and honors; compile an absentee record each week, and operate a follow-up system; call the attention of the teacher and department principal to pupils who have been absent three weeks without explanation; send the birthday cards with the signature of the superintendent; notify the home of special occasions in which parents ought to be interested; arrange that all secretarial work during the school session shall be done quietly and unobtrusively, without distracting attention from worship or study; conduct the school correspondence, make reports to affiliated organizations, and keep a historical record. He will also arrange to give the pastor all the information he desires.

The Financial Secretary will gather the offerings each week and keep a record of the same. He seeks to develop the school in the grace of giving. He has an opportunity of expert leadership in kingdom finances, including Bible principles of increase and giving and the best methods of church finance. He intelligently seeks to further all the causes to which the school contributes. He conducts his office with businesslike faithfulness. All moneys will be promptly paid by him to the treasurer, who will return him a receipt. The financial secretary will keep a record of all school funds in the hands of the treasurer, and make regular report on the same. He will expect a careful auditing of his accounts at the close of the year.

The Treasurer is the treasurer of the church, in the ideal school. 'As a school officer he has an unusual opportunity. Later discussion will be given to school finances.

The Librarian must adapt his office to the changed needs of the school. The public library in most communities is supplying the general reading formerly provided by the old Sunday School library. But the church must still concern itself with the circulation of good religious literature. The librarian has a unique opportunity of promoting helpful reading in the homes of the pupils. But the school also needs books for teachers and workers. Many books on religious education will be purchased by the public library upon request. Even in such a case the school will feel the need of owning books to supplement the work of the teacher-training class and to supply material for the programs of the teachers' meetings. No school library is complete without missionary and social service material adapted to the various grades. The librarian will encourage a reading circle among the teachers and older pupils. As the young people's and adult classes use special courses, supplemental reading ought to be secured and its use promoted. The librarian has charge of the Bibles, reserve text-books, and music-books, and has oversight of departmental libraries.

Ushers, doormen, and attendants will be used as the size of the school warrants. This service is excellent training for young people, and should enlist as many as possible.

Choristers and instrumentalists are necessary to a well-appointed school. Even the small school needs a leader of singing. Superintendents even when musically competent would do better to place this responsibility in other hands.

The departments will need their own instrumentalists. An orchestra is a great help to school or departmental spirit.

The choice of officers should be carefully made, preferably upon the recommendation of a wise committee. The logical nominating agency is the church Committee on Education. This committee may profitably ask the advice of the council with its representation of principals, teachers, and pupils. The election will be made by the church. In the appointment of department principals and in the nomination of subordinate officers the committee will consult with the superintendent.

The installation of officers may be made a public church ceremony. After a sermon or address, the officers are called to the front and asked to subscribe to a dedicatory pledge. Marion Lawrance recommends an excellent form:

"Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I humbly promise him and this church that I will be faithful, to the extent of my ability, to all known duties and responsibilities devolving upon me as a worker in this Sunday School. I will endeavor to be regular and punctual in attendance; diligent in my lesson study; loyal to the established rules of the school; consistent in my example; and will seek earnestly the salvation and edification of the scholars and the truest Christian fellowship among the entire membership."

The service will conclude with a prayer of consecration.

2. THE EDUCATIONAL EFFICIENCY of the school is DETERMINED BY THE TEACHING FORCE.

There is no concern of the school more serious than the securing of teachers. The nation may pass a conscription act to provide itself with soldiers. The school must depend upon volunteers in whose heart the great Teacher has sounded the call of duty and joyous opportunity. Prayer must be made that the Lord of the harvest send forth laborers. In order that this call may be heard, the pulpit must frequently point to the child, and the church must create occasions on which to honor the teacher. The Teacher-training Department ought to care for the supply of the teachers. Recruiting for this department will keep the call to service before the young people. The aim of the teacher-training principal and all the departmental principals is a substitute teacher for every class in school.

The Workers' Conference, or teachers and officers' meeting, is essential to unity and progress. Without this meeting the school work becomes individualistic, falls apart, and tends to ruts. But the Workers' Conference is maintained under the difficulties arising from pressure of many engagements. School leaders need a strong conviction of its necessity and a persistent effort to make it a habit with all teachers and officers. Many schools have a supper, which draws the workers together immediately after business hours, provides a delightful social atmosphere, and saves time. Earnest thought must be given the program, which ought to be planned for the year and printed. Four items should be included in the program: an earnest devotional period which shall refresh every holy purpose in the presence of the King, a paper or class study on some phase of religious education to strengthen educational ideals and give all a forward look, a presentation of practical matters of school administration which are pressing for attention and decision, and an opportunity for dividing the group into departmental conferences. A wide-awake workers' conference under the leadership of an educational director in a Sunday School of Hartford, Connecticut, included the following subjects in its programs for one year:

September—Our Standard of Efficiency:

1. The requirements of the standard.
2. Attaining the standard.

October—Sunday School Scholars and Church Attendance:

1. A realizable ideal.
2. Methods found successful.

November—Cooperation of Parents and Teachers:

1. The need of cooperation.
2. The teacher's part. (Parents invited to this meeting.)

December—The Problem of Substitute Teachers:

1. The problem stated.
2. Meeting the need.

January—Sunday School Leakage:

1. Where it occurs and why.
2. How prevent it.

February—Winning Every Scholar:

1. The pivotal point, the crisis, and the problem stated.
2. The problem met.

March—Training the Workers:

1. Kinds of classes.
2. The training, its nature and scope.

April—Special Days:

1. Their purpose.
2. The educational value.

May—Sunday School Music:

1. Its quality and place in the curriculum.
2. Practical suggestions.

June—Our Standard of Efficiency:

1. Where do we stand?
2. What do we lack?

Interesting and spicy reports from conventions, institutes, schools of method, summer schools, etc., may well be included in a varied program.

3. THE PRACTICAL EFFICIENCY of the school DEPENDS UPON THE STUDENT BODY.

Indifferent or passive pupils defeat the most devoted officers and teachers. No more important task awaits the school leadership than the arousing of pupil activity in line with the purpose of the school. No amount of talking and praying by the superintendent and teacher will take the place of doing by the pupil. Let no discouraged teacher or excusing superintendent say it is impossible to secure lesson preparation or pupil interest, for many testimonies prove that pupils of all ages can be stimulated to the enjoyment of partnership in the school program.

Pupil activity can be secured through: (a) graded worship which enlists the participation of each; (b) promotions which are made at a regular time each year, after adequate tests, which pupils are taught to expect, and which give honor to faithful work; (c) popular opinion which has been marshaled on the side of school work by tactful leaders; and (d) appealing activities which include the wholly enjoyable recreations, games, sports, etc., as well as a service which seems worth while to the pupil because he has been made to hear the call of his Lord.

4. GROUP EFFICIENCY is furthered through representative committees.

Two dangers need to be avoided. On the one hand is the superintendent who has never learned how to delegate responsibility. He tries to do it all unaided. On the other hand is the superintendent whose fertile mind is constantly supplying an exuberance of schemes which somebody else is expected to work.

Beyond the ordinary school routine demands will arise. A few committees are needed. These committees ought to recognize each department in their membership. By all means include pupils on the committees. The school will appoint standing committees: (a) The Missionary Committee will be made up of souls with a missionary passion and a sympathetic knowledge of pupil interests. (b) The Committee on Evangelism may be a great aid to the pastor, and encourage personal work on the part of Christians in each class. (c) The Temperance Committee may be expected to change the school attitude from a perfunctory performance to a mighty interest in the thrilling happenings and dangers of to-day. (d) The Social Service Committee has an opportunity of enlisting the school in community enterprises where it ought to help. (e) The Publicity Committee will keep the public informed about school news, and devise means of appealing to the uninterested and unreached. (f) The Sociability Committee will cooperate with departmental committees, but also have some happy occasions for the whole school, in harmony with the plans of the Church Committee. (g) The Committee on Special Days (Rally Day, Children's Day, Christmas Sunday, Patriotic Days, etc.) should be a standing committee, so as to subdivide and plan its work in advance for the year.

Special committees will be named to meet occasional needs: (a) An Athletic Committee may well be demanded by modern boys and girls. (b) A Parents' or Home Committee may seek to increase interest in the work of pupils.

5. SCHOOL EFFICIENCY DEMANDS A COMPREHENSIVE FINANCIAL PLAN faithfully operated.

When school and church have come into right relations all the financial support of the school will be assumed by the church. The obstacle to this arrangement is found in an unintelligent and unsympathetic church. Its advantages consist in clearly making the school a department of the church and in the opportunity of training the children to give directly to the church. A large Sunday School in Syracuse, N. Y., uses the same set of envelopes employed in the church service, instead of multiplying systems of envelopes. Under this plan of church support, a school budget is recommended to the church by the Committee on Education, including supplies, music, library, publicity, improvement and increase in equipment, contribution to general Sunday School work, etc. With the church caring for this budget, every member of the school is solicited to give at the school session through the current expense and missionary envelopes of the church. In order to make this giving effective it must be made intelligent. Inform the entire school in the details of the church budget for local expenses and missionary giving. The junior age is the important time for forming habits of giving, and the following years for fixing those habits.

When a church is not ready to assume the school budget it is desirable that this budget be worked out with the help and approval of the entire school, as far as practicable. Train them to make the financial policy of the school their own. They ought to vote on missionary causes to which they will give. Present the church program of missionary giving and urge its adoption. While the school platform must not be accessible to every wandering beggar, with or without credentials, the school must not so bind itself to a few objects of giving that it cannot hear extraordinary appeals as they arise, such as a famine in India, a flood in Galveston, starvation in Belgium, or a Red Cross exigency.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

School efficiency administration is here considered under five main heads. Have these put upon the blackboard.

Lead the class in a frank, kindly discussion of the characteristics of the ideal superintendent, secretary, etc.

Have selected members of the class discuss the duties of each officer in turn.

Raise the question for discussion, How shall we get teachers, and how improve the present force?

How may pupils as individuals and a student body contribute to the efficiency of the school?

What committees does a school need?

Who shall serve on these committees?

Ask what is the ideal financial plan for a school of the church, and then consider how this plan can be adapted to your own school.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Make a first-hand study of several superintendents, noting the characteristics which help and those which hinder their work.

2. Outline a possible program for a workers' conference for one year, and prepare a complete program for one meeting, business, devotional, and study, both departmental and general.

3. What is the place and value of sociability in the school of the church? (See Brown, also Lawrance's "How to Conduct a Sunday School.")

4. What recreational activity may be wisely planned for the various departments?

5. Make a study of the subject of committees, their number, their work, and who should serve on them.

6. Work out a complete financial plan for an ideal church and school, showing how the money should be raised, how handled, with whom deposited, how apportioned and by whom, how reported, and how expended.

7. Discuss fully the office of secretary of the school, his duties, his assistants, the best filing system, facts to be filed, methods of operation, etc.

CHAPTER IV

THE PHYSICAL EQUIPMENT

Clothes do not make the man. But they help or hinder. Not only do they indicate his character and standing, but they react upon him. They increase his self-respect or diminish it. They assist in his work or get in his way.

A school can do a great work in spite of its material surroundings and tools. But mental states, especially of children, are mightily influenced by sense appeals. And good teaching will be made better by proper appliances. Aside from personal influences, no factor of school success is more significant than the building and its furnishings.

Many schools defeat themselves by the housing conditions to which they submit. Many schools and departments have been recreated by moving into new quarters.

I. A SERVICEABLE SCHOOL BUILDING provides for departmental and class and recreational needs, while conserving school unity.

(1) A worthy exterior.

Whether the school has a separate building or is combined with the church auditorium, consideration must be given to the impression created by the outside. The community largely forms its judgment from what can be seen from the street. When the building and surroundings are untidy, lacking paint, falling into disrepair, or cheaply pretentious and undignified, it is difficult to persuade men that something worth while is going on within. Even an inexpensive building can be made substantial, artistic, and suggestive of its religious use. On the other hand, it is wrong to spend money for exterior adornment and skimp conveniences and furnishings.

(2) Sanitation and hygiene.

Light and air and heat will be a first concern of the builder. It is a serious charge against any church if it deliberately or carelessly gathers people under conditions that impair health. Toilet arrangements must be adequate and properly placed. Stairs and passageways and approaches should be adapted to the little folks or aged people who are expected to use them. Drinking-water will be protected. The church will insist upon cleanliness or a new janitor. No church will consent to place the children in the basement, except in most extraordinary cases. Rather spend less money on the church auditorium or for church music than place helpless children under improper conditions. Unless a home is the victim of abject poverty, it does not keep its children in the cellar.

(3) Departmental separation.

The modern school has been created by a better knowledge of the child. The need of the pupil is the law of the school. Efficiency demands departments built on the periods of human growth. In the well-ordered school building, Cradle Roll, Beginners, Primary, Juniors, Intermediates, Seniors, and Adults will each have their own room for assembly and worship.

Every effort must be made to secure the religious character of the school session. Care will be taken to train every pupil in the practice of worship. To be effective, worship must be graded. It is desirable that each department meet separately for its own service of worship behind sound-proof partitions. If conditions temporarily require less assembly rooms, the Adults can use the church auditorium, Seniors and Intermediates can meet together, and the Beginners and Primary be joined.

Some operations can be performed equally well on the public street. Others demand the closed door. It is possible to talk at a class in the midst of many noises, movements, and distractions, but it is hard on the teacher, and encourages bad habits in the class. The enjoyableness and helpfulness of the class session will be doubled by a classroom. It not only saves the class from intrusion and strengthens concentration, but enables the class to find itself, heightens class spirit, and provides a social center.

Classrooms may be separated by curtains or movable partitions, but solid partitions are preferable. Entrance ought to be made from a passage and not through another classroom. Care should be taken to provide proper light, ventilation, and heat for the separated classrooms.

(5) The school assembly.

On the great occasions of the year, such as Rally Day, Children's Day, etc., the whole school will come together for part of the session. Commonly these school and community exercises are held in the church auditorium. For entertainments and special week-night gatherings it is better not to use the room associated with church worship, if a recreational center can be afforded. Some superintendents, whose training antedates the graded school, desire to assemble the entire school each session. All the needs of school unity are met by a few significant assembly occasions during the year.

(6) Special rooms.

If possible, the church will supply the school with rooms additional to department assembly- and classrooms, such as a business office, a missionary exhibit and classroom, a library, a museum, a mothers' room, and a welcoming and social room. In the small building ingenuity will devise combinations of uses for single rooms.

(7) Recreational needs.

A serving church seeks to minister to as many normal community needs as possible. An active school attempts to relate instruction and expression. Recreation is a normal need and healthy expression, which ought not to be handed over to the devil because the church doesn't care to do anything more than say, "Don't." The school building should provide for happy social occasions. For the sake of economy, each room should be planned for as many purposes as possible. A gymnasium will also serve as a social hall for games, parties, and entertainments. Girls' and boys' clubs may use their class- or department assembly-rooms.

2. THE SMALL CHURCH must carefully plan its new school building.

In the erection of a house for the mission church or rural church, the school of the church frequently fails of serious consideration. There was some reason for this in the long ago, when the Sunday School session was not distinguished from the ordinary religious meeting which used the church edifice. There is no excuse to-day for church leaders putting precious dollars into a permanent equipment without studying the needs of the modern departmental school. It must be remembered that the building seriously influences all church work done in the church plant, and can be changed only with difficulty, and after a long time. It is better for a building committee to take time for a study of all the needs of the essential church organizations, rather than to act unintelligently and precipitately.

Even the small school ought to plan an equipment which will separate departments. At least three rooms are needed: a room for the Beginners and Primary, a room for adults, and a large room for the years between, with curtained divisions if possible. There will be an expectation of growth in numbers. It will then be necessary to separate Beginners and Primary, and to give the Juniors a room to themselves.

3. AN OLD-STYLE CHURCH BUILDING may be adapted to the needs of the modern school.

Many churches must continue to use buildings which were erected when there was no vision of the educational work of the church. The only real solution is a new building. Until this can be secured ingenuity will devise adaptations of the present structure.

(1) The basement may be finished or extended. This will frequently be the least expensive addition to present space. In some cases it will be necessary or desirable to raise the building in order to give light and ventilation.

(2) Additional classrooms may be erected at the end or side of the present building. If the present house is rectangular in shape, it will lend itself to this plan.

(3) A primary department room may be built as an addition. The needs of the little people will be more carefully met in a room planned primarily for them. They are the greatest sufferers in a building planned for the usual church service alone.

(4) A new church auditorium may be built, leaving the present building to be rearranged.

A growing church is likely to outrun its accommodations. When the membership and general constituency are persuaded of the need of a larger auditorium, urge that the new plans also include the rebuilding or rearranging of the old edifice for school use.

(5) An adjoining or near-by house may be rented. This is not very satisfactory, and ought to be used with the distinct understanding that it is only a makeshift arrangement. It is difficult to maintain the unity of the school under such conditions. Perhaps an older class of tested loyalty can better be sent away than a young class.

(6) A room may be cut off by movable doors or partitions. Where a separate department or adult classroom is needed, it may be possible to partition off a corner of the general room. Three types of partition are used, viz., rolling, disappearing, and swinging.

(7) Curtains may be hung on wires or rods to separate classes or departments. The building may be so constructed as to permit curtain supports, and the folding of the curtain closely against the wall when not in use. These help class attention and order by cutting off the large number of distractions which enter through the eye. They are little protection to the ear.

(8) Screens may be substituted for curtains. Where the building does not lend itself to curtains, or where church opposition is too strong, portable or swinging screens may be used.

In the International Training School at Lake Geneva, Wis., recently, the following additional adaptations and adjustments were reported: use of adjacent schoolhouse, a tent, auto outside a country church for a class, a social settlement, a summertime class under a tree, two or more sessions of the school by divisions at different times. In Glendale, Cal., a church uses chicken-wire covered with vines to separate open-air classes of young women, young men, and Juniors.

4. OTHER CHURCH ORGANIZATIONS MUST BE CONSIDERED in arranging the building.

Selfishness is of two kinds, individual and collective. An organization, such as a Ladies' Aid Society, an organized class, or even a Sunday School may have no thought but for its own rights in the church building. It seems strange to a visitor to find a men's class possessed of the choicest accommodation and a children's group left in unhappy surroundings.

COUNTRY CHURCH PLAN

From "The New Country Church Building," by Edmund de S. Brunner

The Church Committee on Education ought to harmonize the desires of the missionary women, young people's society, boys' and girls' clubs, and various school groups, so that each helps the other do its best work. The committee will need to safeguard the rights of the weak.

5. FURNISHINGS AND SUPPLIES should be provided appropriately for each department.

(1) Beginners may meet in assembly with the Primary in the small school, but need their own classrooms. Their room should be on the street level and easily accessible. They need a cloakroom of their own, or shared with the Primary. The decorations ought to be harmonious, tasteful, and quieting. They need a piano, kindergarten tables and chairs, sand-table, blackboards, pictures, scissors, crayolas, pencils, colored paper, and clay.

(2) The Primary Department needs an assembly-room, and adjoining classrooms for the three grades. The color scheme, including walls, rug, and furniture will be harmonious and tasteful. This department needs kindergarten chairs and tables, piano, blackboards, pictures on the wall within reach, and pictures for class work, models and illustrative objects, scissors, paper for cutting, pencils, paints, crayons, paste, clay, sand, and pulp. Each class should have its locker or case for supplies.

(3) The Juniors ought to have their own assembly- and classrooms. Their room for worship should be large enough to seat all comfortably, tastefully decorated, and hung with copies of a few great pictures. A heavy rug or rubber-tipped chairs will reduce the noise. They will need a piano, blackboard, attendance record board, table or desk for department principal on a movable platform. Each classroom needs chairs with tables containing drawers, cases for supplies and models, blackboards, maps, pictures, memory-drill charts, clay, paper pulp, and sand-trays.

(4) Intermediates and Young People need separate or a joint assembly- and separate classrooms. They require appropriate pictures, blackboards, bookcases, cabinet maps, charts, stereoscopes, and Bibles.

(5) The Adults ask separate classrooms equipped with Bibles, blackboards, maps, pictures, and missionary material.

6. PERSISTENT EFFORT WILL SECURE THE NEEDED NEW SCHOOL BUILDING.

School leaders must realize the need of a new building and agitate, agitate, agitate. Great care must be used in naming the committee. While all the church interests should be represented, it is urgent that men and women of educational vision be appointed. This committee ought to visit various modern buildings and secure all available literature. The architect ought to be selected because he has qualified in erecting church and school buildings.

The campaign for the building fund should be earnestly shared by the school. A heroic effort then will result in blessings for years to come, while niggardliness then will cramp all the future. Careful supervision needs to be given every step of the construction. The dedication of the church school building ought to be made a great occasion for advancing all the essential interests of the school. The beautiful new structure may well call all the neighbors to a revival of zeal for Bible teaching and study.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

Form the class into a building committee.

Discuss with them:

1. Who should be members of such a committee?
2. What reasons shall they urge for a new building?
3. How get the money?

Make each member of the class a special committee on Part I, sections 1-7, of the lesson, and call for reports upon these points.

Now have the committee discuss what may be done to improve the present church building if a new and separate school building is impossible.

Resolve your building committee into one on furnishings and equipment. Have some members discuss the wall decorations, floor coverings, etc. Have other members tell of the necessary equipment for the work of the school, of each class, and of special rooms. Discuss first the necessary and then the desirable things.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Visit a school using a separate building, and report upon its exterior and interior arrangements.

2. Plan the complete equipment of one department of a school with estimated cost, then show what may be done for a small sum in essential equipment.

3. Draw plans for a new building for your own school. (Consult Lawrance, "Housing the Sunday School.")

4. Draw plans for remodeling your building so as to improve the school facilities.

5. Review Evans, "The Sunday School Building and its Equipment."

6. Plan a well-equipped library for the school of the church, giving lists of books for the various departments, also methods of cataloguing, duties of librarian and assistants.

7. Discuss the problem of gymnasium and social rooms in connection with the school plant. (See Barclay's "First Standard Manual of Teacher-Training," Chap. XLV.)

CHAPTER V

THE SCHOOL PROGRAMS

The merry-go-round frequently does considerable business, judged by the crowd and the nickels. But it makes no progress, its music is mechanical, it makes sensitive folks dizzy, it finally becomes tiresome to all, and the crowd drops away without receiving any permanent good.

The merry-go-round school follows a routine instead of a program. A carefully planned program defines the purpose of the school as progressive. Without a program there is no progress.

Programs are for immediate or extended use. Each session needs a program which a thoughtful pencil has committed to paper. Each year needs a program reflecting actual conditions and the intelligent, determined faith of the school leadership. This lesson will confine itself to the immediate programs and reserve a consideration of the school goals till later.

I. THE AIMS OF A SCHOOL PROGRAM need to be clearly defined.

(1) The chief purpose of a program is to secure effective group action, to help folks to do things together. In planning the program we must ask, What can we effectively do together, and how?

(2) The immediate aim of the program is training in worthwhile social habits. If it is desirable that we learn to do certain things together, it is urgent that we be patiently trained in the habits of common action, including promptness, regularity, and order.

(3) The program seeks to call forth spontaneous social feeling. It is fatal if the program stops with the mechanical. We must have some understanding of the psychology of the crowd, and make use of suggestibility and imitativeness to draw out fresh expressions of the emotions. So, for example, the leader's attitudes are imitated, and great hymns, when sung understandingly, are suggestive of appropriate feelings.

(4) The ultimate aim of the school program is social living. By instilling common ideas and awakening common feelings we fuse separated individuals in a common life. We purpose to give that training which will make all social adjustments easier and more genuine. For instance, home conduct will reflect school training.

(5) Any program of the church school depends for its highest success upon the response of the individual and the group to the spirit of God.

2. TESTS SHOULD BE APPLIED TO THE PROGRAM NOW IN USE.

In order to make this study concrete, it would be well to ask some questions of the conduct of the Sunday School as we know it. Let us consider tests of program building and administration.

(1) Carefully planned or haphazard? We cannot expect much from a program to which no thought has been given. The natural result is waste—wasted time, wasted effort, and wasted opportunity.

(2) Living or mechanical? It will be lifeless if the school cannot be brought to accept it as its own. It will secure nothing better than a thoughtless or compelled obedience. Or it may be nothing but the dreadful dreariness of monotony. A listless school may have given up looking for surprises. A good program wears out and needs changing.

(3) Unified or fragmentary? It may be excellent in spots, but lacking a consistent purpose which unites and gives proportion to each part. An excellent feature may be overemphasized, to the detriment of other excellent features.

(4) Adapted or adult? Since administration is in adult hands, there is always the danger of missing younger interests. Consider each group and age, asking whether the worship as planned enlists them.

(5) Educational or organizational? Is it winning results in the hearts and lives of school-members, or does it end with the personal satisfaction of the leader? Do the leaders and workers counsel on the effect of the program and apply tests of efficiency? Is there a willingness to experiment in order to find an even better way?

3. THE PROGRAM OF WORSHIP seeks certain great purposes and depends upon the conduct it secures.

The purposes are: (1) A unified social expression. It aims to gather detached and independent minds into absorption in one great thought. It becomes a social expression as each individual makes his sympathetic contribution to the common act.

(2) The highest, strongest group sanctions. It lifts noble standards for living by the authority of the entire group. It makes appeals and passes judgments with all the force of public opinion and feeling.

(3) An education in primal truths. Here are declared man's need, God's fatherly provision, and the opportunity of loving trust and obedience.

The conduct of worship must be with dignity and reverence; must win general participation; must be a real training in prayer and praise; and must deepen and purify emotion. Burton and Mathews summarize the emotions to be cultivated as reverence, love, penitence, aspiration, and hope. "The vertical power of religion in the heart is the truest measure of its horizontal power in the world."

4. THE SESSION PROGRAM seeks united action in worship and study.

The general program of the school includes three parts: its program of worship, its program of instruction, and its program of service. Of these, worship and instruction are the main purposes of the program of the school session and all others must be kept in a subordinate place.

The session program must include the purpose to deepen and strengthen school consciousness. The group of people that meets to do some things together once a week or oftener is not like a mass-meeting. It has a continuing existence. It is even more permanent and stable than an ordinary school, such as a high school or college which makes a general change of its student body every four years. But the church school meets infrequently, and busy people with many intervening interests are likely to forget. The session program must also build up a loyalty to the organization.

The superintendent must rigorously begin on time. He should set his school an example of alert and businesslike attention to the important matter on hand. He will shame and penalize the tardy ones. He must have his program well in hand, so that it moves smoothly and with precision. All needed supplies ought to be distributed before the opening. All detail business and unnecessary moving about must be kept from the assembly-room.

The great themes upon which programs of worship are built need change after a reasonable period of use. It is advisable to plan the school worship for the year, and to take advantage of patriotic and religious days.

The general assembly program is planned for schools whose building does not permit the separation of the upper departments, but which must temporarily combine a wide difference in ages. It will carry such items as the following:

(1) Musical prelude—preferably by a school orchestra.

(2) Period of silence—which can be secured without clanging of bells, by a tactful and persistent superintendent.

(3) Call to worship (e. g., Hab. 2 : 20, etc.)—repeated in concert and changed quarterly.

(4) Hymn.

(5) Responsive reading or repetition of a psalm, Beatitudes, or other memorized passage.

(6) Brief prayer, sympathetically lifting every hearer in its simple language into the Holy Presence, and concluding with the Lord's Prayer.

(7) Hymn.

(8) School motto or aim repeated in unison. (E. g., 2 Tim. 2 : 15.)

(9) Presentation of offerings with prayer.

(10) Announcements and reports from preceding Sunday, analyzed briefly from the report board in order to encourage attendance, giving, and winning new scholars

(11) Dismissal for class study—orderly and promptly.

(12) Lesson study period.

(13) Warning signal.

(14) Reassembly, excepting the young people's and adult classes, which have their own closing where building arrangements permit.

(15) Special features—such as a brief address (which will not be a lesson review), or a missionary story, or a temperance or patriotic program.

(16) Hymn.

(17) Closing prayer.

The elementary programs are markedly different. Each department will have birthday recognitions, offering services, appropriate hymns and prayers, and handwork adapted to the varying interests of each grade. In addition, special features will be provided for:

The Beginners:

- (1) March with chairs to the circle.
- (2) Greetings and good-morning song.
- (3) Welcome to new children and returned absentees.
- (4) Cradle Roll recognition.
- (5) Circle talk.
- (6) Story giving the thought or message.
- (7) Good-bye song.

The Primary:

- (1) Quiet music and service of worship.
- (2) Fellowship service.
- (3) Memory drill.
- (4) Lesson story.
- (5) Closing prayer and song.

The Junior:

- (1) Responsive service from memory.
- (2) Fellowship service:

- a.* Birthdays.
- b.* New scholars.
- c.* Church attendance.
- d.* Honor pupils.
- e.* Announcements.

- (3) Bible drill.
- (4) Patriotic and missionary service.

Salute to American flag:

“I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.”

Salute to Christian flag:

“I pledge allegiance to my flag, and to the Saviour for whose kingdom it stands, one brotherhood uniting all mankind in service and in love.”

Missionary story or song.

- (5) Devotional service.
- (6) Lesson study.
- (7) Closing prayer and song.

The combined church and school session has been tried with varying results. Commonly the closing exercises of the school are made the opening of the service of public worship, without break or pause. This plan depends for its success upon competent leadership and the hearty cooperation of both school and congregation. It has the advantage of impressing upon the whole congregation the prime importance of Bible study and of closely identifying the school and church in the fundamental act of worship. Under weak leadership or a failure of cooperation there is a tendency to cut down the actual time given to the combined service so that both the period of class teaching and the time of the sermon are seriously curtailed.

5. THE CLASS PROGRAM should conserve the limited teaching period.

could be done under direction. Few parents are able or inclined to teach their children how to study. Because home preparation cannot be generally secured, teachers fail of their best results.

But under existing conditions most classes are limited to thirty minutes for the teaching period. The program of the lower classes is wholly in the hands of the teacher, who will expedite routine business and insist upon no intrusion during the teaching. Organized classes must not take the time on Sunday for business which ought to be transacted during the week. The president will have the program well in hand, insist upon a prompt beginning, have an opening prayer, a song (if the room warrants), read the lesson passage if there is one, secure the attendance record and offering, make announcements briefly, and introduce the teacher, who will close the period in his own way.

6. SPECIAL PROGRAMS should have place in the annual scheme.

Special occasions must not break into regular work too frequently. And superintendents must not let the great occasions go by default. Make the year's program with missionary education, evangelism, social service training, special exercises, and special days in their proper place. All special programs must be planned for their educational effect on the pupils, and must not simply use the children for the entertainment of adults.

The missionary program of the school will have regard for atmosphere, instruction, and training. By pictures, decorations, museum exhibits, and curios, and by hymns, prayer petitions, and Scripture comment, an impalpable and influencing atmosphere will affect all school work. Instruction may be given from the platform by brief addresses, picture and map talks, and exercises or dramatic presentations in costumes. Instruction should be given in class by using the regular graded material or the missionary application of the Uniform Lesson, or supplemental material, or an elective course for young people and adults. Training in giving, and attitude, and service is of earliest importance. Training in habits of giving properly begins in the Beginners' room. Giving should be voluntary, systematic, proportionate, and with an intelligent interest in a missionary objective.

Church festivals ought to be taken advantage of to impress more deeply related religious truth. No wide-awake school will miss the opportunities of Christmas and Easter.

Patriotic days may be noted. The session program and decorations may appropriately suggest the significance of Independence Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Memorial Day.

Special days of the school of the church. Tralle well expresses the purpose of these special days as "attracting new members, developing loyalty, promoting enthusiasm, satisfying social instincts, and magnifying the school in the community."

Rally Day is usually observed the last Sunday in September. It needs careful planning by the workers' council so as to be a "little different" (not an easy task when it is used each year), and well advertised. Everybody who has ever been connected with the school, and everybody who ought to be, must learn that he is wanted. Decorations will be appropriate to the autumn season. A printed program is worth all it costs. Report the year's work in an interesting way. Ask a Sunday School leader to give a popular talk on the value of religious education. Give the program a varied appeal.

Promotion Day is frequently combined with Rally Day. Graduates from the Cradle Roll, Beginners', Primary, Junior, and Intermediate Departments are formally promoted and receive certificates. Unless a special graduation service is arranged, teacher-training diplomas will be presented on Promotion Day. Its observance strengthens the grading and departmental organization of the school.

Children's Day is commonly observed the second Sunday in June. It is an occasion for popularizing the school in the community and placing the small child in the midst. Attention will be given the Cradle Roll on the program. Care must be taken, however, that the public does not understand from Children's Day that the church school is an infants' school.

Home Department Day should be the annual occasion for linking this easily forgotten department more closely to the school. This occasion ought not to be lost in Rally Day or Children's Day.

Mother's Day or Parents' Day may well be recognized.

Decision Day will receive later consideration.

Installation of officers may be held on the Sunday following election, and, if possible, as a part of a public church service.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

Put the suggested general assembly program on the blackboard, then ask the class to name some of the aims suggested in "I," and point out how this program fulfils these aims, e. g., How does it secure group action?

Now write down a program you have seen followed in your own or some other school, and have the class apply the five tests to it, showing wherein it succeeds and where it fails.

Have different members of the class discuss the elementary programs, the junior program, etc.

Ask the class to consider what is being sought in the worship of each department, and how it should be conducted to bring the desired result.

How should class time in the different grades be planned to get the best results?

Have the class consider (a) what special days should be observed and how, (b) what missionary instruction should be given in each department, and (c) in what way general missionary exercises can help the atmosphere of the school.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Make out a possible program for the guidance of a superintendent in the weekly preparation of his work. (See Fergusson, "How to Run a Little School," Chap. IV.)

2. Review Hartshorne, "Worship in the Sunday School."

3. Prepare an outline of missionary study for the different departments of the school. (See Beard, "Graded Missionary Education in the Church School.")

4. Plan missionary expression or social service suitable for each grade of the school.

5. Make a study of hymn-books with a view to deciding which book is most suitable for general school use, which for a given department. Discuss the principles of hymn selection for use in the school of the church.

6. Work out in detail certain special day programs, as Mother's Day, Rally Day, etc.

7. Study your own school, and make suggestions for changes in general or departmental programs, giving reasons for same.

CHAPTER VI

LESSON COURSES

A traveler happened upon a very difficult passage of the Old Testament. Puzzled, he read the words aloud as his car drove along. A runner overheard, and asked, "Do you understand?" "How can I, except some man should guide me?" So Philip joined the Ethiopian in his chariot and explained the meanings of Isaiah.

Some argue that lesson courses and lesson helps are not needed in the Sunday School. They would place the entire Bible, as we have printed and bound it, in the children's hands, without specially prepared text-books. But the ministry of Philip is still needed. Sunday School experience has proved the wisdom of asking trained lesson-course builders to assist the teacher in selecting Bible material suited to the needs of the growing pupil, and of asking trained lesson writers and editors to make available expert help on the meanings of Scripture.

I. THE SMALL SCHOOL USUALLY BEGINS WITH A SIMPLE CURRICULUM.

One of the earliest questions facing a new school concerns its plan of teaching and study. In this connection five considerations ought to receive attention:

(1) The need and number of the pupils.

Since the school has been organized for the sake of the pupil, this consideration must come first. If the school invites Beginners to come, it ought to understand the religious needs of Beginners, and adapt its scheme of Bible teaching to their comprehension and necessity. Similarly each grade we invite to come must be intelligently and devotedly ministered to. Because the understanding of the pupil we serve is fundamental, we have carefully studied the first unit in this course on "The Pupil" as a preparation for lesson course planning.

Not only the need, but the number of the pupils concerns us. The number of lessons taught will depend upon the number of classes, with a reasonable number in each class. The simplest class organization calls for a Primary class, a Junior class, and an Intermediate class, a Young People's class, and an Adult class.

(2) The ability and number of teachers.

After discovering how many classes can be formed, search will be made for teachers. The best available teachers should be secured. No teacher can teach lesson material with which he is unfamiliar or which he is unwilling or unable to master. Excellent lesson courses are impossible when they make demands which are beyond the powers of the teaching force. On the other hand, a faculty of poorly equipped teachers may grow up to a worthy course, if they are willing to pay the price of study.

(3) The church's consistency in its message.

Every church which has a reason for its existence was founded and is maintained to give its own testimony of the truth of God to the community. A church defeats itself when it obscures or contradicts its message. Not infrequently the teaching of the Sunday School has little relation to the faith of the church whose name it bears and for which it presumably speaks. Careful school leadership will insist upon consistency in the teaching it offers. Courses and lesson helps which have been constructed so as to give offense to nobody and adapted for teaching in any school, need to be closely scanned, and if adopted, supplemented or modified by a denominational school.

(4) The financial item is a practical question.

Too much can be made of the money question. If we believe our children are worth good instruction, we will find some way to raise the money needed for good text-books. The argument of cheapness ought to have the least weight with us.

(5) Choice must be made from available courses.

The question is not one of ideally perfect courses. None exist. We are compelled to choose from the best available for our purpose, or summon a sufficient ability to construct courses of our own. The educational leadership of the school, after an impartial study of all the courses offered, will thoroughly inform the Workers' Conference of the strength and weakness of each before decision is made.

The International Sunday School Lesson Committee and its series of Improved Uniform Lessons may well receive attention. This committee was named by the National Sunday School Convention of 1872, and issued a seven-year cycle of Uniform Lessons in 1874. The committee was chosen from Sunday School leaders of scholarly and biblical ability, with corresponding members in Great Britain, who later became known as the British section. This committee has had a large part in improving Sunday School teaching and associating scattered effort in a common movement. The joint committee issued series of Uniform Lessons which were increasingly popular until 1914, when the committee was reorganized and enlarged. The Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations now names eight representatives, the International Sunday School Association names eight, and each evangelical denomination which maintains a lesson-course committee is entitled to one. This new committee, of approximately thirty-six members, decided to follow the Uniform Lessons with an eight-year cycle of lessons, combining the principles of uniformity and grading.

The Improved Uniform Lessons were planned to go into use January 1, 1918. "Uniformity is maintained by the use of a common title for the whole school, a common brief lesson text for printing, and a common Golden Text. All the teachers are also encouraged to read the same selected readings; and with many lessons a devotional reading has been chosen for use in the public exercises of the school. Having thus sought to conserve the advantages of the Uniform System, the committee decided to seek to adapt the lessons as thoroughly as possible to the various departments of the school. Special topics, special memory verses, and additional material have been designated, wherever it seemed possible to make the lessons more helpful to pupils in the different departments."

The Improved Uniform Series has all the advantages and disadvantages of a compromise scheme. It helps the unity of the school, simplifies the matter of giving assistance to all the teachers, makes it easier to secure substitute teachers, and serves to unite the worship of the home with the worship and teaching of the school. It also enables Sunday School editors to make it practically a Departmentally Graded Lesson Series.

This series is open to the serious objection of giving first concern to the subject-matter and only secondary concern to the child. It has not wholly given up the attempt to adapt the child to the book. Instead of considering the need of the child first, and then going to the book to find what meets that need, a passage selected for reasons of uniformity demands the accommodation of the child. It is an advance over the old Uniform Lessons, in that it gives some graded material. But it will be chosen by schools which must keep in mind the limitations of teachers and leaders and the size of the school, rather than give an unrestricted consideration to the needs of the pupils.

2. THE PROGRESSIVE SCHOOL SEEKS CLOSELY GRADED LESSON COURSES.

Departmentally graded courses can only serve as a temporary expedient. Human life changes too rapidly through the growing years to permit one lesson to suit ages three and four years removed. Public-school grades show big differences between the seventh and fifth, between the fourth and second, and between the eighth and twelfth. Educators would not think of grouping these classes under one teacher and before the same text-book. That would mean a return to the ungraded country district school.

The International Sunday School Lesson Committee was instructed by the Louisville Convention in 1908 to issue a series of graded lessons covering the entire curriculum of the school. In 1909 the committee issued the first years of the Beginners, Primary, and Junior series. Since that time all the Elementary and Intermediate Courses have been put out, and Senior and Adult Courses have been begun. Elective courses are in preparation for Seniors and Adults.

The purpose of the graded lessons is to meet the spiritual needs of the pupil at each stage of his development. The Beginner's need is met by short concrete stories, dealing with simple human relations and the wonders of nature which show God as the loving Father. The need of the Primary child is met by simple Bible stories with easily understood moral issues, teaching obedience, kindness, and helpfulness. The Junior is given stories of the deeds of man, involving religious and moral crises, and presenting ideals, social duties, and a feeling of responsibility. For the Intermediates are brief biographies and histories glorifying noble character. The Senior is supplied with biographical, historical, doctrinal, and practical material presenting religious ideals and supplying training courses for active service. For the adult there are in preparation studies in the deeper meanings of the Christian life and a varied application of Bible teachings.

3. EACH SCHOOL SHOULD ADAPT A CURRICULUM TO ITS OWN NEED.

Dr. H. F. Cope has summarized the characteristics of a good curriculum as: (a) genetic—built on life processes, taking account of epochal periods and making the pupil the absolutely determining factor; (b) unitary—arranged in a coherent whole and related to the whole educational activity of the pupil; (c) comprehensive—giving as complete information, training, and discipline as possible, and including the whole content of religious education.

With these principles in mind, and surveying its teaching force, equipment, and membership each school must accept the responsibility of determining its own lesson courses thoughtfully and experimentally.

4. LESSON COURSES MUST MAKE PLAIN AND STRONG THE EVANGELISTIC PURPOSE OF THE SCHOOL.

It is possible to press education at the expense of evangelism. Lesson courses and treatment must safeguard the evangelistic appeal. McKinley says, "Only a gospel that is graded by the needs of the hearers can save those of different grades, and only a gospel that grows with the growing soul can make pupils into Christian men and women."

5. A BALANCED CURRICULUM MUST INCLUDE MISSIONARY, SOCIAL, AND TEACHER-TRAINING MATERIAL.

Frederica Beard instances three essentials of missionary and social teaching: (1) A comprehensive plan which includes the entire missionary and social education of the pupil; (2) a correlated plan connecting this teaching with the experiences of pupils and related to other plans of the church; and (3) a progressive plan, adapted to each grade of the school. Teacher-training will receive later discussion.

6. YOUNG PEOPLE AND ADULTS MAKE SPECIAL DEMANDS UPON LESSON COURSES.

Pupils in the upper grades develop widely scattered interests. In order to appeal to the largest number, changes of subjects of study should be regularly made and announced. The International Lesson Committee has recognized this need by promulgating elective courses for Seniors and Adults, of three months and six months in length.

7. THE PUPILS' READING SHOULD BE ENCOURAGED IN CONNECTION WITH LESSON COURSES.

Attractive illustrated Sunday School papers not only afford appropriate Sunday reading, but are carried into many homes which are without religious literature. Care should be taken that these papers really contribute to the religious life of the pupil, and therefore supplement the regular lesson instruction.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

If we suppose a school gathered in classes and departments, the question arises, What shall the teachers teach? Considering this matter ask the class the following questions:

1. What would be the state of affairs if each teacher selected his own course?

2. Or if the teacher selected the lessons week by week, irrespective of what had previously been taught?

3. What difference will the number of pupils make in the course chosen?

4. How will the number and ability of the teachers affect our choice?

5. Should the fact that this is the school of a particular church make any difference in our choice?

6. What other things affect the choice?

Have some one give a brief history of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee.

Then have some one explain the new Improved Uniform Series, naming its good points and pointing out its pedagogical defect.

Certain great principles underlie the choice of a curriculum. Have these stated, and then apply them first to the Improved Uniform and then to the Graded Series.

What subjects must be included in a church school curriculum?

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. The history of lesson courses. (See Cope, "The Evolution of the Sunday School"; articles in the "Encyclopedia of Sunday School and Religious Education.")

2. Send to your denominational house for samples of Graded and Improved Uniform Lesson Series. Write a paper discussing each and describing their relative merits.

3. Discuss Hutchins, "Graded Social Service."

4. Make a study of social service activity from Athearn's departmental discussion.

5. Send to your denominational mission boards for catalogues showing graded material for missionary instruction, and construct a plan from these for use in your own school.

6. Discuss the use of elective courses. What classes should have them, under what circumstances? Report the Senior and Adult Elective Courses in the Graded Lesson Series.

CHAPTER VII

INCREASING EFFICIENCY

"Certain arts, such as sculpture, painting, and architecture, have been called the fine arts. The pastor's and teacher's arts, though the tyranny of language forbids calling them the fine arts, may be given an even nobler title; they are the high arts," writes Amos R. Wells.

The demands upon the teacher multiply. It was a comparatively simple matter to teach a book. It is life that must be taught and trained, and life is so difficult to understand. Under the modern conditions life has increased its relationships with their possibilities of good and evil. The advance of general education and the very advance of the Sunday School in organization, equipment, and lesson courses make the task of the teacher harder. It is no place for quackery and cheap service. It is a splendid opportunity for him who will pay the cost.

I. THE FORCE OF SCHOOL WORKERS MUST BE MAINTAINED AND INCREASED.

The school suffers an appalling loss of teachers, beyond the reasonable and necessary changes. Some of the causes of this loss are: (a) Wrong assignments. A teacher may be given a class for which he is not fitted and where he is foredoomed to failure. (b) Defective equipment. The conditions under which we ask him to teach may make teaching practically impossible, and the school makes no effort to give the class protection and facilities. (c) Lack of appreciation. Because he is human, the teacher works better in an atmosphere of sympathy. Often a tactful superintendent can bring a class to a fairer attitude toward a sacrificing teacher. (d) Failure of discipline. While the teacher must be primarily responsible, discipline is always more than a class matter, it is a school affair. Willing teachers who are weak at this point may be helped, before their position becomes intolerable. (e) Inadequate lesson preparation. No teacher can or ought to last long, who talks out of an empty mind. Pastor and superintendent must keep before teachers the necessity of faithfulness to their message. In a well-managed school signs of teacher trouble will be noted, and first aid rendered, or if a resignation becomes necessary, a new teacher will be made ready.

In order to maintain its present work, as well as provide for growth, a school needs additional workers. The pulpit and prayer-meeting must ring out the Master's call to labor, and question the reality of a Christian experience which is unwilling to serve. Honor must be given to the teaching office, and its rewards held up. At regular periods, say at the opening of church work in the autumn, possible workers will be canvassed, and selections made for regular and emergency service. After it is decided that you need a particular worker, remember how a successful life-insurance agent secures his man. Expect Christian young people to find places of responsibility. When actual need arises, no true-hearted young people can remain to enjoy the fellowship of a class in preference to serving. Do not forget to pray that He send forth laborers into his vineyard. It may be that workers are not forthcoming because the church needs a revival. It needs to be purified of its worldliness.

The minimum requirements of a teacher are fourfold:

(a) A personal religious experience. How can one teach the meanings of the Christian life except he be a Christian drawing upon a present, living experience?

(b) A sympathetic interest in human life. It is not only a love of one's fellows, but an understanding of the growing child, youth, and man that he requires.

(c) A usable education. The teacher needs what the schools can give him. If he failed of these advantages he must find means of making up his deficiency.

(d) A knowledge of his message. He must be a student of the Bible and of missions and of the social gospel in its modern applications.

2. NEW AND OLD WORKERS NEED TRAINING, AND EVER MORE TRAINING.

A period of apprenticeship ought to be expected and planned for. Find the best teacher-training class leader you have. In the smaller church the pastor or pastor's wife will feel they must fit themselves for this important work. Then make a beginning with the young people, even if the first class is small. By keeping at it for a few years the school will come to accept it as part of the regular order. Educational workers must never cease growing. They must never reach satisfaction with their theoretical or practical ability. They ever need more training, because they ever need more knowledge of their subject, of human life, and of improved method.

The teacher-training course ought to hold up the highest possible standard within reach of the school. The easy course will have its earnest advocates. It is a simple matter to memorize a certain amount of prescribed material, but the memoriter method does not produce great teachers. Insist upon a course which gives the needed information and challenges independent reflection. The course ought to include:

(a) A study of the growing mind, as a fundamental requirement. Because all the work of the school must be adapted to the child, it is imperative that the child be understood. Every teacher-training subject needs to be approached from the genetic point of view. It is impossible to decide properly on lesson courses, school organization or equipment, without a thorough foundation in the psychology of growing life.

(b) A study of educational processes. How does the mature life pass its guidance to the immature? What powers are provided immaturity for personal growth and ripening? The teacher must intelligently build his art upon the activity of the pupil.

(c) A study of method and organization. While teaching is personal, it is not exclusively individual. The teacher is only a part of a social organization which is molding pupil life, and it is needful that the larger method be shaped by wisdom gathered from many experiments.

(d) A study of subject-matter. It is not only an adult's thorough knowledge of the Bible and missions and social principles and church history which is needed, but a knowledge of the subjects to be taught in the light of the pupil to be taught.

(e) Observation and practice teaching. A teacher-training course of theory only will not make teachers. Opportunity for observation and criticism of good teaching ought to be given, as well as opportunity for actual teaching under direction.

The New Standard Teacher-training Course, as promulgated by the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, provides for forty lessons a year during three years of study. It is agreed that no diploma recognition will be granted for less than the one hundred and twenty lessons, though certificates of credit may be issued for one year's work, or one unit. The first year units are arranged to cover the subjects of the old First Standard Course, making child study fundamental. The prescribed units are:

First Year Units:

The Pupil.

The Teacher.

The Teacher's Study of the Life of Christ.

The School of the Church.

Second Year Units:

Significance and Teaching Values of the Old Testament.

Significance and Teaching Values of the New Testament (other than the Life of Christ).

The Message and Program of the Christian Religion.

How to Train the Devotional Life.

Third Year (Specialization):

It is proposed to offer five specialization courses of forty lesson periods each for the third year's work, including (a) Beginners and Primary, (b) Junior, (c) Secondary, (d) Adult, and (e) Administrative Units.

Beginners and Primary courses will offer specialized child study, story-telling, and organization and methods.

Junior courses will offer specialized child study, Junior teaching material, Christian conduct for Juniors, organization and methods.

Secondary courses will offer specialized study of the teenage, secondary teaching material, Christian doctrines and institutions, and Secondary methods.

Adult classes will offer 'Adult psychology, social message of the Bible, church organization and leadership, and Adult aims and methods.

Administrative courses will study the Principles of Religious Education, the Church in its Educational Task, the School Curriculum and School Management.

Diplomas and Graduation. No man of courage likes to put his hand to a plow and look back, even though plowing is tough work. Keeping everlastingly at it brings success. One by one the examinations are rolled off and the credits accumulated, until at the end of the effort comes the satisfaction of a hard task well done. For the sake of publicly honoring unselfish industry and scholarship, of enlisting new teacher-training students, and of advertising the school and its teaching, hold a public teacher-training graduation.

The Workers' Conference, or Teachers-officers' Meeting, ought to be in part educational and supplement the teacher-training work of the school. Many churches are now keeping one night a week as Church Night, combining a devotional and study meeting, and giving opportunity to the school department workers to meet separately for a short time.

The Institute, School of Methods, Community Training School, or Graded Union is an opportunity for securing specialists of ability to supplement the training efforts of the single school. Several denominations are providing educational leaders, who offer this help to groups of churches, or isolated churches.

3. SCHOOL-MEMBERSHIP OUGHT TO INCREASE WITH THE EFFICIENCY OF THE WORKING FORCE.

There is danger in numbers if we have not the teachers or organization which can properly care for them. On the other hand, we are not building up a "select school." The practical missionary spirit of the school must show itself in providing workers, training workers, and systematically and aggressively seeking new members.

The new members' campaign must be carefully planned. Every two or three years there ought to be a community survey conducted by all the churches. While zealous for new pupils, no self-respecting school will permit "sheep-stealing." The community survey gives denominational preferences which must be respected. Contests between groups in the school, or a Red and a Blue division, or between two schools of about equal size stimulate interest and zeal. Bright advertising keeps the school before the community and favorably disposes many who can then be sought individually. But the best membership booster is a happy, loyal school spirit.

Members must be retained as well as won. A public recognition of new members makes them feel they regularly belong. Absentees must be followed up by personal inquiry. The sick ought to have flowers and a call. Birthday cards afford a personal touch. Names will not be dropped until every possible effort has been made to win back to active membership.

Notice of significant personal happenings, like a bereavement, notable honors, a departure to another city, etc., increases the family feeling, and the conviction they really care for you in that school.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

Ask the class to think over the teachers they have known who have given up, and suggest reasons for their failure. Jot down these and any other possible reasons.

Ask if you were seeking teachers, what four things you should require.

Raise these four questions :

1. Do most of the teachers you know need more training?
2. How can they get it?
3. Why do we have normal schools?
4. What is the normal school of the church?

Ask for the five essential elements in a teacher-training course. Secure from your denominational board copies of the new Teacher-training Standard. Study this with the class, to see how much has been covered, and impress them with their need of it all.

Discuss school growth :

1. Have we room and teachers, can we get them?
2. Why should we try to grow?
3. What methods can we use?
4. How can we hold what we have gained?

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

Write a paper on the place of the "Ministry of Teaching." (See Burton and Mathews, "Principles and Ideals for the Sunday School.")

Study the reasons for success or failure of teachers in any given school.

Review McElfresh on "The Training of Sunday School Teachers and Officers."

Make a study of teacher-training requirements as outlined by Athearn and Cope, and show how the new Standard fulfils these requirements.

Write a paper on the value of teacher-training to oneself, one's pupil, and one's school.

Prepare an attendance chart of your school for the past year. Discuss reasons for any fluctuations, and ways of increasing attendance.

CHAPTER VIII

THE SCHOOL DEMOCRACY

"Its ae thing tae feed a calf wi' milk, and anither to gie it the empty cogie tae lick," said Ian MacLaren's sermon-taster.

Is the pupil finding something in the school that interests him, that draws him with a relish, that gives him enjoyment? Or is he listless, simply obeying habit or a sterner compulsion that is able to force his attendance while his heart is far away?

The attitude of the pupil becomes increasingly significant. If his interest and enthusiasm can be won, his own spiritual development is assured, and the school comes to its highest power and success. If his growing abilities cannot be enlisted, he will not remain long with us, but while he does remain, he will be an increasingly difficult problem, an obstacle, a means of discouragement, and possibly of defeat. On the other hand, student cooperation makes work light and fellowship a joy, and reveals unsuspected opportunities.

I. THE SCHOOL SEEKS TO DEVELOP THE POWERS OF THE PUPIL.

The beginning is found in the sympathetic interest of the teacher in the individual pupil. It will not be long before the good teacher knows about the home, habits, friends, and school or business of the new pupil. The shyness of childhood or youth may puzzle one who cannot understand, but the teacher knows when he has been accepted as a friend to be counted upon. The strengthening of that personal tie means that his teacher's influence is next to mother's.

The true teacher is tactfully increasing class activities and enlisting the interest of every pupil in these activities. In the junior years, when the world is still seen largely through the imagination and life must not be prosy, but must keep company with lions and princesses, the class club will avoid every-day names and borrow from romance. The teen-age brings strong social interests, at first limited to one sex, then including the other, and is responsive to the appeal of a worth-while service. Among the many activities and interests of adults there is danger of omitting religious work. The teacher of the adult class ought to insist upon a class organization with a program of activities, especially when the inertia of the class begs it be not disturbed in its laziness or in its absorption in other things.

The school and teacher must see a pupil association larger than the class. It is possible to satisfy pupil and teacher with the class fellowship. But there is danger to the pupil and the school, if the growing pupil is not encouraged to enter the larger associations of the department and school, without lessening his class loyalty. God purposes for every life a large, generous social self, through which a share is given in many and diverse relationships. We are apt to satisfy ourselves and limit others to small and few attachments. All the Junior classes ought to be doing a few things together, so as to create simple relationships. More important is it that the young people's classes have associated effort and a departmental organization. Most difficult of all is the task of relating adult classes, but they need each other, if only to keep themselves out of ruts, and they can make a beginning of acting together. The beginnings of such cooperative action are often found in a pressing church need.

2. THE SCHOOL SHOULD INVITE PUPIL PARTICIPATION IN THE SCHOOL GOVERNMENT.

Discipline is a school and class concern. It is not surprising that the problem arises when you consider the child's weakness of self-control and the various home governments from which pupils come. Frequently conditions for which the pupil is not responsible operate against order and discipline, such as poor ventilation and light, uncomfortable seating arrangements, example of teachers and adults, slipshod and monotonous programs, confusion, and interruptions. As a protection to the child the school ought to change these conditions or change its officers.

Good order does not mean repression, and an absence of all movement and noise. Good order in the Beginners' room will be quite a different matter from good order in the adult class. Good order is whole-hearted occupation with the business in hand, in such a way as to help and not hinder others in the business prescribed for them. The secret of good order is directed and accepted occupation. The devil has no chance with busy hands.

Special cases need special treatment. Be sure you understand before you pass judgment. The boy's story ought to be listened to respectfully. Maxima debetur pueris reverentia, quotes Mallet—"Children have a right to be treated reverently." Bad boys may simply be the victims of their own excess of animal spirits and of a program that has not learned how to keep them employed. In the private interview begin by appreciating the good you find. Enlist the parents' sympathetic help. Even more important is the public opinion which the offender recognizes. Miss Espey urges that the teacher of the unruly girl who causes friction and antagonism, the apparently disrespectful girl and the girl who is always taking offense, first seek to understand the girl and get her point of view, carefully avoiding a scene and depending upon the solvent of personal attachment and sympathy. Difficult cases of discipline can sometimes be handed over to a trial by their peers. This is a secret of the success of the George Junior Republic, which asks the boys to elect a judge and prosecuting attorney and select a jury before whom culprits are tried.

Prizes and awards help or hinder school spirit. They may degrade the motive of work and ultimately defeat the purposes for which they are given. Somebody said: "Turn your school into an ice-cream and peanut stand, and you will have nothing but dishes and shucks when the edibles are gone." All good work contains its reward within itself. Recognition of industry, perseverance, and skill ought not to transfer the estimate of value to something of lesser worth. Bestow certificates of promotion, honors, diplomas, public or printed mention for honestly attaining set standards, and not as a species of flattery. Let us cherish in our boys and girls the ideal of Kipling in

"And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each, in his separate star, Shall draw the Thing as he sees It for the God of Things as They Are!"

A School Council is a means of associating pupils in school management. Each of the upper departments may be invited to name representatives to sit with the officers and teachers in discussing and deciding upon the questions of general policy. It should be understood either that their action binds their departments and classes or that they may report back for approval. Such a plan will rob young people of the feeling they are under an autocratic or bureaucratic government. It will also give the superintendent counsel from points of view he needs to consider, and serve to develop a strong sense of unity of purpose.

A strong, self-conscious social organism with faith in itself and joy in its mission is the aim of school workers. Individualism in pupil and teacher and leader must quickly or gradually yield itself to the larger life. No one liveth unto himself in the school genuinely Christian. There is no place for a spirit of separation, insistence upon one's own way, or exclusive personal friendships and following. No class loyalty must obscure the school. The glory of a class as of an individual Christian is that it serves and is willing to lose its life that it may be saved.

3. THE SCHOOL AIMS TO ENLIST PUPILS IN THE WHOLE SCHOOL TASK.

To the pupils the whole work of the school may be contained in the school and class session. For their education it is well to bring the financial plan for the year, including the missionary giving, before the School Council and the whole school. Its adoption will mean, they must understand, that they have made these tasks their own. For similar reasons, it is advisable so to present the Cradle Roll and Home Department that help will be forthcoming in enterprises which the school makes its own. The Home Department with its superintendent and visitors affords the school an opportunity for a unique relationship with the homes of the community, in which all ought to be interested. When a community movement is on in which a community institution like a Christian school ought to interest itself, propose to the entire school-membership that it vote to participate. Scan church plans and general religious movements for possible school interest and help.

4. THE SCHOOL SHOULD SEEK TO FIND PARTNERSHIP IN THE LARGER SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK.

No school liveth unto itself. It has a part in its own denominational Sunday School task. It must inform itself of general plans and leaders. It must help awaken the denomination to the fundamental importance of religious education. It must lend its leaders to denominational effort and counsel. It must assist in educationalizing the denominational contribution to present-day Christianity.

And there is a splendid Sunday School movement which has enlisted all the denominations. A school which fails to send representatives to the interdenominational conventions and to make itself a part of the mighty Sunday School movement embracing us all, both limits the good it receives and loses its chance of helping in a great cause. The democracy of the school needs the development and opportunity for service which come from giving itself to these great armies.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

In this lesson we are to try to look at the school with the eyes of the pupil. As pupils, in what three ways should you say that your teacher could help you to develop your powers?

Discuss the school council, showing how, by including pupils in school government, it may be made a power in arousing school interest and strengthening esprit de corps.

Suppose one member of the class to be an unruly boy; ask him to tell what makes him disorderly. Have another member of the class tell how he would handle such a case.

Repeat the supposition with one of the girls.

Have the class name five causes for a disorderly school.

Rice-Christians is the name given in the Orient to any who seem to have become Christians for pay. Does the class think the giving of prizes will make rice-Christians of our pupils? How shall we recognize merit?

Suppose one pupil to be a member of the Home Department, and inquire:

1. What is expected of her?
2. How is the department managed?
3. What benefit does she receive?

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Write a paper on how the church may hold the Junior boy or girl. (Consult Athearn, "The Church School.")

2. Write a paper on how a teacher may gain the cooperation of the pupil. (Burton and Mathews, Chap. VII.)

3. Write a paper on the granting of awards, showing how it may be done to stimulate effort and yet avoid the dangers of the prize system.

4. Discuss the Home Department. (Consult Faris, "The Sunday School at Work.")

5. Give the history of the International Sunday School Association. (Consult Cope, "Evolution of the Sunday School"; article in Encyclopedia; leaflet issued by the International Sunday School Association.)

6. Consider a given class of boys or girls, state difficulties of discipline, causes of trouble, and suggest remedies.

CHAPTER IX

STANDARDS, GOALS, AND IDEALS

Upon one occasion Roosevelt used the term "shibboleth" in addressing the New York Legislature. It was discovered that some members thought he was talking about a weapon.

Confusion in the use of the terms in the title of this chapter is common. Not infrequently a school adopts a challenging motto or battle-cry defining its goal for the year, and tends to narrow all its work within the limitations of its catchword. Again, a school accepts a standard which it follows in so mechanical a fashion as to forbid individual initiative and obscure the ideal.

The ideal ought to be sought in the product of the school of the church, and will advance with our understanding of the possibilities of human life in Christ Jesus. The standard is our attempt to make a comprehensive statement of the means approved by general experience as best adapted to realize an ideal product. The goal is a statement of an immediate objective in view of the adopted standard.

I. In the development of general education, SCHOOL ORGANIZATION AND METHOD TEND TO BECOME STANDARDIZED. Democracy insists upon popular education. Our age is remarkably educational. Most of us have noticed the changes in the public-school building. Those of us who have traveled with our eyes open have noticed similar changes taking place in widely scattered American communities. A like progress and tendency to uniformity is affecting lesson courses and text-books. Children withdrawn from any grade can enter a public school one thousand miles away with little loss from readjustments. Back of this increasing standardization is the training of teachers, which is proceeding upon common presuppositions of grading, study subjects, and all the well-ascertained results of child psychology.

2. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL HAS ADVANCED BY LIFTING SUCCESSIVE STANDARDS.

The Society for Promoting Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominion issued a set of rules in 1785 which included the following: "(1) Be diligent in teaching children to read well. (2) Neither writing nor arithmetic is to be taught on Sunday. (3) Range your scholars in classes according to age and ability. (4) Avoid as much as possible corporal punishments."

The changing emphases of the Sunday School movement have been indicated in Doctor Cope's historical statement:

1785—The Sunday School, a "ragged school."

1850—The Sunday School, a nursery of the church.

1890—The Sunday School, the Bible School.

1900—The Sunday School begins to be thought of as the School of the Church.

These successive stages of Sunday School advance produced their own methods. In one period they were limited to the care of neglected children for a quasi- or partial religious training. In the following period concern was felt for all the children of the community, and their need was seen to be religious. Later, attention was given to Bible lessons, and a tremendous influence toward standardization came in with the Uniform Lesson Series. Another epoch was marked by considerations of grading and the adoption of Graded Lessons by the International Convention. The difficulties arising from teaching graded lessons by untrained teachers stimulated teacher-training and the standardized teacher-training Courses. At the present time there is evidence of the beginnings of a movement toward a standardized type of building to house the departmental school.

3. THE ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS IN A WORKING STANDARD of the school of the church include administration, education, equipment, and evangelism.

A Standard Administration is made up of executive officers who are competent school leaders, an adequate and efficient working force, and a thorough business and financial system.

A Standard Equipment provides a building and furnishings adapted to the requirements of a graded school.

A Standard Educational Organization has graded the pupils, teaches graded lessons, promotes pupils after satisfactory completion of prescribed courses, trains its teachers, organizes departments and older classes, directs missionary and social service and recreational activities, and correlates all the training agencies of the church.

A Standard of Evangelism is both individual and social. It reaches into the community in service and for recruiting. It faithfully and understandingly presses the claims of Christ the Saviour.

A Sunday School Standard has been used with good results by progressive State Associations for several years. More recently the denominations have claimed the right to formulate standards for their own schools. This responsibility of denominations for the direction of their own Sunday School work has been cordially recognized by the International Sunday School Association and its affiliated State Associations. Each progressive denomination has lifted its own standard. An example of a standard framed by denominational leadership and administered in the schools of that denomination is given in the appendix.

4. INTENSIVE SPECIAL EFFORT for a limited period is ASSISTED BY THE FORMULATION OF A GOAL AND SLOGAN.

When the small boy refused to go to school after a few days' trial because he was afraid he'd get the habit, he probably had looked down the whole long weary course. It is easier, and one can keep more cheerful if the gaze is limited to what is immediately on hand. This is the philosophy of the goal.

The school ought to choose annually a goal or series of goals, with fitting catchwords. In a special effort for new members these slogans have been used, "Every one win one," "Beat 800," "Double," "Every member of the church a member of the school."

A wise leadership will take up, one by one, the school deficiencies as indicated by the Standard, and plan a popular effort under names and conditions that appeal to the imagination.

Sometimes the school is summoned by the denomination or interdenominational fellowship to a big simultaneous drive for a significant item or items in the school program. Such a movement gives each participating school all the enthusiasm of partnership in an enterprise tremendously big.

The Class needs a goal.

A Sunday School of Woodbury, N. J., adopted an "Efficiency Campaign." To each class was suggested a schedule of effort for three months based on its past averages, and including attendance, punctuality, offering, new scholars, and prepared lesson. In most cases classes said they could do more than requested, and pushed up their minimum of efficiency. The secretary reported each Sunday the percentage of each class on the basis of their minimum of efficiency. So much interest was aroused, and the results were so helpful that the classes voted to continue the plan another quarter.

The department needs a goal.

A Sunday School of Toledo, Ohio, under the leadership of a Director of Religious Education, sets goals of attendance, enrolment, and promptness for each of its departments in a cleverly arranged set of reporting charts for use each Sunday in each department.

5. GOALS AND STANDARDS NEED TO BE INTERPRETED IN THE LIGHT OF IDEALS.

Our aim is great lives. We desire to make the school a help to teacher and pupil in the attainment of their highest. We know that this is possible only through such relations with Jesus Christ as he prescribes for them. We are challenged by this twofold mystery: the unique and undiscovered greatness of each human life, and the "unsearchable riches of Christ." Humbly learning of each boy and girl and man and woman for whom and with whom we work, and above all seeking to know him, "the Way, the Truth, and the Life," we must constantly criticize our methods lest they become life-destroying, instead of life-giving.

6. TESTS OF EFFICIENCY WILL BE PRAYERFULLY APPLIED BY CONSCIENTIOUS SCHOOL LEADERS.

Fergusson writes, "To make a close analysis of his own little Sunday School with a view to determining what ought to be its standard product when rightly run, is part of the superintendent's duty, and for him to balk at this on the ground that it is God's work, is just pious laziness, with a probable admixture of reluctance to have his work submitted to any efficiency test whatsoever."

Are there evidences of developing Christian character in workers and pupils? Are there indications that the charm of the book is casting its spell over eager hearts? Is there a general responsiveness to the call to worship and an evident appreciation of the presence of the unseen God? Is a desire to serve being awakened? Are consciences becoming more sensitive and as intelligently true as the needle to the pole? Are there joyous conversions with the testimonies of living that impress their fellows? Is the school multiplying its service and influence in the community? Are narrow, selfish provincials lifted into a concern for all the unevangelized of the nations, and an enthusiasm for missions? Are all seeing more clearly and laboring more devotedly for the new social day, the end of class and race and national hatreds, the destruction of war, the abolition of armies and navies, the federation of nations, the brotherhood of peoples, and the coming in of the glorious kingdom of our God?

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

There is a very important difference between an ideal, a standard, and a goal. The class should be drilled upon the definition of each.

Take several minutes to have each one write out and read his ideal for the school of the church.

Take up your denominational school Standard point by point, and determine exactly where your school stands in relation to it.

Have the class suggest possible school, department, and class goals, with slogans.

One member may tell what questions he would ask himself, were he director of religious education, to test the efficiency of the educational work of the church; another, what questions he would ask, were he superintendent, to test the efficiency of the school; and so on for department principal, teacher, and other officers.

OBSERVATION AND INVESTIGATION

1. Make a study of the Sunday School from Raikes to the present day, showing the advancing requirements with the changing purpose of the school.
2. Make a study of class mottoes to determine whether these are used as goals and changed from time to time, or as ideals; if the latter, are they broad and comprehensive enough, or are they narrowing in their conception?
3. Study your own or a neighboring school on the basis of its standard, giving a rating on each point.
4. Work out on paper plans by which a given school may make up its deficiencies and become standard.
5. Gather from as many Sunday School workers as possible statements of their ideal for the school of the church.
6. Compile from the Sunday School books in your library a number of statements of the ideal for the school.
7. Imagine yourself a teacher in turn in each department, and write out your ideal for yourself under each circumstance.

CHAPTER X

THE DIVINE COPARTNERSHIP

A small boy got his mother's permission to go fishing. He got more. She carefully prepared a lunch. When the great company assembled, the Teacher directed that it be graded. But this was not enough. The fish and bread must be placed in his hands for mysterious multiplication, and then above five thousand were fed.

1. CONSCIENTIOUS HUMAN EFFORT IS INCOMPLETE WITHOUT GOD'S BLESSING.

We live in a world of law. Intelligence has placed causes behind their appropriate results. If you desire certain results, you must understand and provide the causes. If the school of the church desires character results, it must intelligently secure the cooperation of the causes that make great lives. Because failure issues so disastrously here, we must conscientiously seek to know both the best methods and the mighty principles that lie behind the methods. Nor is this all. At any cost of labor increasing intelligence must build a better school organization.

After the school has perfected its machinery to the last detail, it may be hardly better than a failure. Somehow the essential thing is lacking. It may be that attention has been exclusively given to the human effort. God has been left out of account. "Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but God giveth the increase." "Except Jehovah build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except Jehovah keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." We need to study the conditions of the divine copartnership.

2. CAUSES OF RELIGIOUS INEFFICIENCY MUST BE SOUGHT AND REMOVED.

These causes of failure may be: (a) Disobedience. In every church God calls whom he will have serve him, and seeks to lead such into larger and more exacting obedience. When church-members feel no obligation in a divine call, or when workers selfishly limit what they are willing to do, judgment and not blessing impends. (b) Inconsistency. Example before young eyes is more potent than instruction. Pharisees taught the letter of religion, but because they lacked its spirit Christ denounced them as hypocrites. While we must not surround workers with unsympathetic criticism, no school should permit the continuance of a leader whose life is known to be untrue. (c) Indifference to truth. At great cost and to meet a great need God has given and preserved revealed truth. When those who are commissioned as teachers of religion fail as searchers after truth, it is not surprising that those who sit at their feet miss the heavenly light. (d) Jealousy. An enterprise which requires intimate associations gives opportunities for envy and jealousy. Unless this ugly spirit is crucified, it makes for unhappiness and defeat. (e) Unconcern for sin and unbelief. It is possible to teach as though there were in the world, and in the lives we touch, no such destroying, hellish force as sin. We may entirely miss the necessity of teaching a salvation from sin, because it has deceived us in our blindness, and we feel no hot indignation, no sense of the pupil's peril. Our teaching is without power if we do not know that faith in the Saviour alone saves from sin, and that unbelief is the last and worst sin. (f) Failure of love. We may relate ourselves to our pupils in a perfunctory way. They may have little place in our thought between Sundays. Surely no life can be saved by such long-distance treatment. "Because thou art lukewarm and neither hot nor cold, I will spew thee out of my mouth," was written to the church at Laodicea. (g) Prayerlessness. Has every boy and girl been carried before the throne by some petitioner who will not be denied? Is there a movement toward united prayer that comes in overwhelmingly at times because it is recognized he is the Head of the school, and he alone can meet the tremendous need?

3. EVIDENCES OF SPIRITUAL FRUITFULNESS MUST BE EXPECTED.

"Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples." A school whose service God is honoring may expect to see: (a) Growth in knowledge and grace. Individuals and groups will discover a deeper interest in the Bible. In the general prayer-meeting of the church, in the young people's meeting, or in the class the testimony will show a clearer insight into truth. The note of reality will appear in Christian experience. The grace of God will be at work transforming life. (b) Fellowship. The workers' enjoyment of each other will be something more than the sociability of an exclusive set. Any one who would serve in the name of the King is welcomed within the charmed circle. It is made up of those who know how to be patient and to forgive and to take the lowest seats. The spirit of cooperation summons the strength of all to the help of each. (c) Spontaneous service. Generous impulses are a normal Christian product. Willing hearts and alert minds will find ways to emulate him who went about doing good. Classes and departments will find novel means of ministry. The best service is not the formalized or programized, but the free movement of love. (d) Joy in worship. The solemn and conventional brand of religion does not appeal to children. In the general exercises where the school has a chance to express itself, a test is had of the genuineness of the religion of the school. The school of power has a real enjoyment of worship. (e) Drawing power. A salesman goes forth confidently when he "has the goods." A school makes its own reputation in the community. An invitation to a school actually doing business cannot be ignored. Once a visitor in such a school, it will be difficult not to come again. Such a school will grow necessarily. (f) Religious life-work recruits. This needy world must have many kinds of Christian service. Not only are ministers needed, but also missionaries, teachers, evangelists, workers for young men, young women, boys, girls, and many others. With a vision of this large world need the school will ask for volunteers, and find strong, clean, capable young people pressing forward to enlist. (g) Evangelistic results. God's blessing upon the school of his favor will be manifested in no place more markedly than among those who find Jesus precious as their Saviour. If this sign is withheld the earnest school will proceed to question itself. When boys and girls in their own simple, beautiful way, or when mature men and women still granted a day of mercy, publicly put on Christ, it will be a time of great rejoicing for pastor, superintendent, teacher, and school.

4. EVANGELISM MUST BE STUDIED IN METHOD, AND PRAYERFULLY AND PASSIONATELY PURSUED.

We cannot reap when we do not sow. If we do not expect and plan for conversions there will be few converts. The educational plan for the year should put evangelism in a prominent place in the minds of all teachers. In the first grades elementary teachers are giving an attitude toward Jesus Christ. In the Junior department more definite instruction should be given concerning the first simple steps along the way of salvation. In many concrete applications to the child's experience the contrast may be drawn between following Jesus and denying him. Before Teen-age and Adult pupils teachers will appreciate that their better knowledge of the issue more directly involves conscience on the part of those who have not become Christians. Some are finding their way to him, asking for more light for the removal of difficulties. Some are stubbornly opposing the convictions of their own hearts. Some are sunk in indifference. The good teacher will learn the facts in each case and govern himself accordingly in private interview and in public teaching. Every reference will be made with a seriousness befitting the eternal destinies which hang in the balance.

Decisions must somehow and somewhere be made by those who in their individual right accept or reject the invitation of Jesus. Children must be both helped and protected in making their decisions. A wise school does not permit a storming of their emotions such as hardened sinners need. But a wise school, appreciating that the early teens is the normal time for the high decision, will leave no stone unturned in teaching the meanings of the decision and making the accompaniments of decision quietly impressive.

Decision Day, or Forward Step Day, or Declaration Day, should be carefully prepared for, by pastor, superintendent, teacher, and Christian pupils. Personal interviews should be sought by teachers who make the unconverted feel their concern, and if possible lead them to accept Christ. By one plan or another pupils must be given the opportunity of coming out on the Lord's side. Some schools assemble all the upper departments for the appeal and declaration. Other schools do the work separately in the Junior, Intermediate, Senior, and Adult departments. Other schools will ask the pastor to teach classes in turn, and have a Decision Day for the class.

Whatever the method of securing decision, it is very desirable that the pastor form a Young Disciples' Class each year. An excellent program for such a class is found in C. W. Gilkey's "A Course of Training for Church-membership."

5. THE SCHOOL SPIRITUALLY ALIVE WILL ATTEMPT THE UNUSUAL AND WIN SURPRISING VICTORIES.

Programs are not made to bind, but to set free. We study general school method in order to perfect our practice of the essentials—worship, instruction, service—and having habituated these, we face the unusual opportunities of our situation. The school which is throbbing with life, the life which God imparts, will perfect its routine, but never be satisfied with routine.

Providence opens new doors. It may be the preparation for the coming evangelistic campaign places the stress on men's work, and the school has its chance to drive for largely increased men's classes. It may be the public school leadership makes room for definite cooperation, and the school of the church must provide week-day instruction or work for high school Bible credits. It may be that a foreign-speaking community has come into the church field and challenged the school of the church to include them in its adapted work. It may be that the school has sent a number of its young men to the army or navy, and must plan to continue them in the school fellowship and work. Whatever the shifting phases of the battle, good generalship will organize new forces for the new attack.

Great work requires great faith. "According to your faith be it unto you." The prayer life of leaders largely determines school atmosphere and results. The burden becomes too heavy unless secret sources of strength are found. Enthusiasm fails unless you have touch with Him who is consumed with zeal for his Father's house. He goes before in more ambitious plans and heavier battles.

And when he gives signal victory, have a time of rejoicing so as to give all praise to our matchless Leader.

HINTS ON LESSON PRESENTATION

We have come to the most vital part of our study, that for which all that has gone before exists, the spiritual values in the life of teacher and pupil. Lead the members of the class to testify to the value of prayer and Bible study to themselves.

Lay stress upon the importance of time for prayer if one is to be a leader of others.

Ask the class what evidences of spiritual growth may be looked for in the lives of pupils of Primary, Junior years, etc.

Take up conversion, what is it? When may it normally be looked for in the life of the child?

How may we help pupils to a definite acceptance of Christ as Saviour?

Discuss with the class all the pros and cons of Decision Day. Should it be observed? and how?

Lead them into a consideration of their own school, wherein it is religiously lacking, and why.

Close with sentence prayers of consecration to the high service of spiritual leadership in education.

1. Review McKinley's "Educational Evangelism."

2. Make a summary from the Sunday School books at your command of the value and difficulties of Decision Day.

3. Discuss the relative merits of School Decision Day, Forward Step Day, Class Decision Day, and Pastor's Class.

4. Follow up the results of Decision Day in your own or some other school, and compare with some school that makes no such effort.

5. Review some book on personal work, such as Trumbull's "Taking Men Alive."

6. Read Wells' advice on prayer in "The Successful Superintendent," and plan a daily program of prayer and study for a Sunday School superintendent.

7. Study the public prayers in your school. Do they help the spirit of reverence, are they within the comprehension of their hearers, are they stereotyped? What might be done to improve the prayer life of the school?
